Muhammad's audience gets that long distance feeling

CJN Staff

TORONTO — Khalid Abdul Muhammad didn't need to enter Canada to deliver his latest diatribe. He used the telephone.

The former aide to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan was supposed to speak last Sunday at the University of Toronto.

But earlier in the week, Canadian immigration officials, acting on a complaint from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), said they would turn Muhammad back at the border because of his 1987 fraud conviction and the chance he might violate hate laws by expressing anti-Semitic, anti-gay and anti-Asian views.

In a letter to Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi, CJC president Irving Abella called Muhammad a "racist agitator" and a hatemonger.

Instead of appearing in person, Muhammad, 45, addressed more than 300 people over the phone at a west-end Toronto social club.

The crowd cheered as Muhammad made his feelings clear in his 20-minute speech. Whites and Jews are the "enemies and the oppressors" of the black race, he said from somewhere in the United States. Audience members paid $10 to hear him.

Muhammad said there is "no comparison" between the Nation of Islam and the Ku Klux Klan because "no one ever put them in slavery for 400 years."

Muhammad made similar statements to a Montreal audience last May, when more than 500 people turned out at Concordia University to hear him call Jews "lying, hypocrite, no-good bastards."

Muhammad later failed to appear at an immigration panel after he left Canada of his own accord.

He also made headlines in November when, at another college campus — this one in New Jersey — Muhammad referred to Jews as "bloodsuckers."

The comments, officially condemned by the U.S. Congress, caused Farrakhan to suspend Muhammad as his national assistant.

But Muhammad said he was not coming to Canada "to teach black people to hate white people, nor am I coming to teach black people to hate Jews. I'm coming to teach black people to love self.

"We want to be sensitive to [Jewish] suffering, but they and others must be sensitive to ours."

That "sensitivity" was demonstrated last month, after Muhammad toured the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

Commenting on that visit in an April 19 address at Howard University, he said, "They had piles of shoes, as if I was supposed to be impressed. We didn't even have shoes."

He also referred to Jews as "swindlers," adding, "You have your Schindler's list but it's really a swindler's list."

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada expressed concern over Muhammad's proposed Canadian visit.

"There is no room for hatemongers in Canada," said the league's national chair, Steve Scheinberg.

Scheinberg said he heard Muhammad speak last May at Concordia University and described the speech as "the worst outpouring of anti-Semitism and homophobia ever to hit my ears."

Gerda Frieberg, chair of CJC's Ontario region, said she was thankful Muhammad couldn't show up but "we continue to be disturbed that there are people who would entertain his hateful message by other means."

Israel, PLO 'concessions' lead to signing

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The long-awaited agreement that Israel and the PLO are signing in Cairo this week is the result of significant concessions from both sides.

In reaching the agreement, Israel granted some PLO demands that would give the Palestinians the symbolic trappings of statehood — including their own postage stamps and international telephone codes.

But the measures do not go so far as to imply Israeli recognition of Palestinian sovereignty.

The Israeli cabinet and officials at PLO headquarters in Tunis gave their approval Sunday for their respective leaders to sign the agreement, which will usher in a new era of Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip and Jericho.

The agreement by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat clears the way for the implementation of the broad principles of Palestinian autonomy that were signed last fall in Washington.

Some 2,500 guests were slated to be at the Cairo ceremony, hosted by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and attended by U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, who is touring the Middle East on a fresh round of shuttle diplomacy.

The final, unresolved points in the agreement were to be hammered out at an 11th-hour "summit meeting" between Rabin and Arafat this week.

Both sides have agreed that these final points — which include the precise size of the autonomous Jericho district and the deployment of Palestinian police on the Allenby Bridge between the West Bank and Jordan — would not be allowed to hold up the signing.

Agreement on the final document was reached at the talks in Cairo following a trade-off of significant concessions between Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Arafat.

With Rabin's prior approval, Peres agreed to let the Gaza-Jericho self-governing authority issue its own postage stamps, have its own internationally recognized telephone dialing code and issue travel documents that were described as both a laissez-passer and a passport.

The PLO gave in to Israel's insistence that Israeli nationals come solely under Israeli legal jurisdiction for any crime they might commit inside the territory of the self-governing districts.

While the full text of the political and security agreements was not to be published until after Wednesday's signing ceremony, it is believed to contain the following main elements:

- The Israeli army withdrawal from Gaza and Jericho will be completed within 10 days of the agreement's signing.
- The temporary international presence to be stationed in Gaza and Jericho will hail from six of the countries which are contributing materially to the Palestinian self-government, but not from the United States. There was no agreement yet on their exact number.
- Residents of Gaza and Jericho will be issued a travel document, labeled "Laissez-Passer" with the word "Passport" printed below. It will be valid for three years.
- Arafat, who will be free to visit or take up residence in the self-governing districts, will continue to call himself "chairman of the PLO" — or, if elected chairman of the Palestinian self-government, that title — but not "president of Palestine."
- The Palestinian postage stamp will bear the legend "Palestinian Authority."
- The next session of the Palestine National Council, the PLO's so-called "parliament-in-exile," will take up the question of abrogating the sections of the Palestine National Covenant calling for Israel's dismemberment. This was a commitment undertaken by the PLO in the agreement on mutual recognition that accompanied the Declaration of Principles signed last September in Washington.
- Palestinians will be guaranteed unfettered freedom of movement between Gaza and Jericho, under detailed arrangements that have been hammered out.
- Another issue reportedly resolved in principle, but not yet published, even informally, is that of air-space rights and arrangements, over both Gaza and Jericho, and other parts of the West Bank that may revert to Palestinian self-rule in the next phase of the peace process.
- The "Cairo Agreement" reached earlier this year, mainly regarding arrangements at the Allenby Bridge crossing between Jordan and the West Bank, has

Yesha spokesman says peace will lead to 'bloodiest war yet'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Capitulation. Jews as lampshades and soap. Arafat collaborating with Hamas. Jews slaughtered by Arab terrorists. Israel committing suicide. Arafat on trial for crimes against humanity.

Yesha spokesman Yechiel Leiter pulled out all the rhetorical stops last week in sounding a dire warning that Israel is rushing headlong into disaster through its negotiations with the PLO.

Speaking in the last of Holy Blossom Temple's lecture series on Israel, Leiter presented an impassioned critique of the process he said will inevitably lead Israel not to peace but to its bloodiest war yet.

"This process is based on a fallacy, a myth called incremental implementation," he asserted. Granting sovereignty to the Palestinians and ceding territory will lead to heightened expectations of statehood, he said. If Israel does not grant them that statehood, their frustration could lead to the outbreak of war in which Israel's Arab neighbors will join in, he predicted.

Leiter, a riveting spokesman for Yesha, a Hebrew acronym for the settlers' movement in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, said the PLO has failed to implement its part of the Declaration of Principles (DoP) signed in Washington last September. Soon after singing the DoP, PLO chairman Yasser Arafat appeared on Jordanian television and asserted it did not contradict the Palestinian covenant, which still calls for the eradication of Israel, Leiter said.

Perhaps what Arafat says to his own people is more telling than what he says on the international stage, he suggested.

There have been 39 cases in which Fatah, the segment of the PLO under Arafat's control, abrogated the DoP by attempting to murder Jews, he continued. Six have been successful. If Arafat can't end the killings, then how can he deliver on a peace treaty, he asked.

Recounting the many PLO terror attacks that have claimed scores of lives over the years, Leiter said Arafat should be brought to trial for crimes against humanity. Later, when commenting on the Hebron mosque attack, he wondered why the government of Israel and Jews elsewhere were quick to apologize for something they did not do. Where were the nations of the world when Jews were turned into lampshades and soap?, he asked. Why did it take his arm being twisted before Arafat would halfheartedly condemn one of the murderers by his own men, he asked.

Leiter said the peace negotiations envision a 9,000-man "police force" — really an army of PLO murderers who will patrol the streets in areas given to the Palestinians. That is the first time since the Holocaust that Israel has willfully put the security of Jews into the hands of others, he added.

Leiter claimed recent evidence shows the PLO and Hamas are collaborating in a "good cop, bad cop" scenario. With every Hamas attack that kills Jews, Arafat says he needs extra forces to control the situation. But, Leiter claimed, Arafat is informed prior to every Hamas attack.

A master orator who combined biblical references to Judea and Samaria with current security concerns, Leiter said these areas were essential for Israel's safety.

Furthermore, there is no consensus in Israel to give up the land. "You can't make peace externally at the price of peace internally," he said.

Leiter said the solution to the Israel-Palestinian imbroglio is turning Jordan into a state for the Palestinians. He suggested that King Hussein step down and and Palestinians take over, satisfying their desire for sovereignty.

When asked whether that approach was "fantastic", he replied that depending on Arafat to deliver peace is "secular-messianic thinking" that is not rooted in the real world.

Leiter was preceded by Yehudit Tayar, a leader of the Beit Horon settlement. Using a map of Israel with plastic overlays as a visual aid, she showed how 70 percent of Israel's population and 80 percent of its economic infrastructure are dominated by the mountains of Samaria and Judea. In addition, "whoever sits on the top of the land [the Samarian mountains] will ultimately decide who has the water," she said.

Leiter and Tayar also spoke last week at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue at an event that was also sponsored by Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation and the Beth Sholom Congregation.

Racist rock concert draws U.S. band

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Bernie Farber

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is questioning why an American band was permitted to enter Canada to perform at a racist rock concert held shortly after Hitler's birthday.

Immigration authorities were informed that the band, Maximum Resistance, would be entering Canada, said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress.

Not only was the band permitted to enter but members weren't arrested for selling merchandise without a permit at the concert site near Brampton, he said. The goods included neo-Nazi T-shirts.

Farber said immigration authorities have stopped other bands from entering the country and expelled others soon after they arrrived.

While he was critical of immigration officials, Farber was quick to praise Toronto law enforcement officials. Police acted quickly to track down the original location of the concert and to persuade the owner of the Latvian Hall on College Street that the booking was for a racist rock concert. That led to the immediate cancellation of the concert, Farber said.

A "Rock Info Line" which publicizes similar concerts claims that "CJC ordered the police to do this." It said the owner of the Latvian Hall cancelled the booking when police warned him that members of Anti-Racist Action (ARA) were planning to confront concert-goers at the Hall.

Members of ARA did gather at Christie Pits, site of a 1933 riot in which Jews and others from minority groups fought a pitched battle with members of the Swastika Club. The ARA gathering fizzled out before any confrontation could take place.

MONTREAL —Tzemah Yoreh, a 16-year-old high school student of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, recently won the first prize as the highest scorer for the Jewish Diaspora in the International Bible Contest held in Israel.

Yoreh outscored 50 contestants from 28 countries to capture the coveted award.

He is the son of Dr. Harry Fox and Dr. Tirza Meachum, both Talmud professors at the University of Toronto. He is the grandson of Bella and Benny Fox of Montreal.

The Canadian segment of the contest is sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Jewish National Fund, the Jewish Educational Council of Montreal and Board of Jewish Education of Toronto.

Hatemongers head to campus in search of new recruits

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Hatemongers in search of new recruits are now targeting college and university students, said Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Farber presented a workshop on racism and its impact on the Jewish community during the seventh National Jewish Education Conference held recently in Winnipeg.

He noted that, while hate groups are not growing significantly overall, increasing numbers of young people are turning out at their meetings.

"It is frightening going to a racist meeting and seeing 120 young people seig heiling," he said. "It is as frightening today as it must have been in 1939. Racist violence is also growing."

Although hate groups have never been represented in mainstream Canada, Farber observed, they are becoming more emboldened of late. Economic conditions are such that for the first time in Canadian history, the next generation will have fewer opportunities for success than their parents. Unemployment among young people is around 18 per cent. Violence is increasing.

"Rose-colored glasses are no longer for sale," he said. "Hate groups are taking advantage of these conditions. They give young people hope for the future based on hate, racism and discrimination. Modern neo-Nazis, have learned from the past. They have repackaged themselves in candy-coated names like White Rights activists, the Church of the Creator or the Heritage Front."

Farber suggested that Jewish educators seem to think their students are immune from being taken in by such groups. The schools do not deal with racism.

He also admonished the Jewish school system to chip away at our own biases and tendencies to intolerance.

Israeli consul general sees hope for new peaceful relationships

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — Good intentions and good will can overcome the obstacles to peace, an Israeli diplomat told a Halifax audience April 26.

Itzhak Levanon, Israeli consul general in Montreal, said he sees no "technical problems in reaching a peace with the Palestinians and Arabs but mature people and mature states need a change of mentality."

Levanon was speaking to a group of Jewish communal leaders.

He said Israelis are sincere in their desire for peace but want every detail addressed. "We want security," Levanon said. "The accord will be irrevocable later on so we have to be cautious."

Levanon, who will complete a four-year term in August, participated in the first round of PLO-Israeli peace talks in Washington a few months ago.

"I don't see any other alternative than to shift from the violence to a more peaceful relationship with our neighbors," he said, tying Syria, Lebanon and Jordan into his discussion of Middle East peace.

Meanwhile, Levanon expected Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's trip to Russia last week would foster positive Russian activity in the peace process with Syria.

Itzhak Levanon

"Without Syria, we can't reach a comprehensive peace," he said. "And the international situation is the best right now to reach peace. If we miss it now, when might we have another chance?"

He is frustrated that extremists want to derail the peace process. He emphasized that Israel wants a peaceful Gaza Strip, "not a land from which will come a killing squad. We want a peaceful neighbor with more autonomy and that can mean a new life for both peoples, with cooperation, open borders, business between them and a life together."

In a two-day visit to Halifax, Levanon met with Nova Scotia premier John Savage, toured the Nova Scotia legislature and met with the mayors of Halifax and Dartmouth. He also spoke with the editorial board of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and Mail-Star.

He and Savage discussed areas of common trade interest between Israel and Nova Scotia. "We will work on those areas and try to match those interests," said Levanon.

He asked the mayors to consider naming a street or square in their cities after Jerusalem, which will soon celebrate its 3,000th birthday. Halifax, a port city, was also approached to twin with a seaport city in Israel, although no specific site was mentioned.

Levanon later told the Jewish leaders the Atlantic region was doing well in fostering the relationship between the Diaspora and Israel "and it goes beyond fundraising or the work of any organization.

"The region is doing well, increasing visits by its youngsters. There are special ties that we must enhance and the leaders of the Jewish community have a pivotal role to play."

South African Jewish emigres take part in historic vote

'Genuine sense of excitement'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Their votes may have been different but South African Jewish emigres here had one thing in common when they cast ballots last week in their homeland's first all-race election: an overwhelming sense of history.

"It was like I was voting for the first time," enthused Denise Bagley, who left South Africa for good in 1984 and is now executive director of the Canadian Zionist Federation. "The feeling I had was a genuine sense of excitement, that [voting] was not just by a privileged minority."

That giddiness seemed to pervade the roughly 12,000-strong South African Jewish community in and around Metro Toronto, especially those who went to vote at South Africa's consulate.

As "someone who believes in the future of South Africa," Bagley, 50, cast her ballot for African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela, the best man, she feels, to begin the country's long healing process.

Bagley seemed unmoved by the fact that, among the first people Mandela received after his release from 27 years' imprisonment was PLO leader Yasser Arafat, and that the ANC leader, while professing admiration for Jews and Jewish values, has made a number of questionable remarks about Zionism.

Be that as it may, Mandela "has sound judgment," Bagley said, adding she believes the situation in her birthplace cannot get much worse.

The biggest challenge ahead, most observers agree, is that posed by extreme rightist whites, especially the para-military, pro-Nazi Afrikaner Resistance Movement (AWM), led by Eugene Terre'Blanche.

"The AWM is heavily armed and well-trained," Bagley said. "The militant arm of the ANC and the [far-left] Pan African Congress youth wing won't stand for it."

Gavin Rome, a 28-year-old lawyer who quit South Africa almost four years ago, agrees that President F.W. de Klerk is headed for a cabinet post in the new government, possibly that of vice-president.

"My sympathies are with the ANC but it's important in the new South Africa that there be some form of opposition," said Rome, explaining his choice.

Rome too fears what he calls "the loony right," but he added that the new government will likely have to expend a lot of energy satisfying Inkatha leader Mangosuthu Buthelezi that the elections were free and fair.

He feels "very few" of South Africa's remaining 100,000 Jews voted for Mandela and the ANC.

Jews turned away from ANC

The Jewish vote, Rome surmised, was likely split between the Democractic Party and de Klerk's National Party, the latter ironic, since the National Party did not admit Jews until 1958.

Jews turned away from the ANC because it is still perceived by them as "a black party," he explained.

The shared opinion is that the leftist Pan African Congress and the far-right Conservative Party probably received hardly any Jewish votes.

Rome said voting in the historic election "felt tremendous, very civilized. It was like, 'Welcome to the real world.' "

Colin Baskind, president of the South African Jewish Association of Canada (SAJAC), said he did not vote "because I'm now a citizen of Canada. It just didn't feel right."

But had he cast a ballot, Baskind "would have given the ANC very serious consideration. I have a personal belief in Mr. Mandela and I don't believe in Mr. de Klerk." Mandela "is just miles above anybody else."

South African Jews are still leaving but most will stay, Baskind feels, because of well-entrenched lives and professions that are not readily exportable.

In a separate development, talks between Israeli President Ezer Weizman and other Middle East leaders are expected to coincide with the inauguration of South Africa's new president on May 10, which Weizman is slated to attend.

Israel's ambassador to South Africa, Alon Liel, said there is confidence in diplomatic circles that visiting leaders will meet for talks about the Middle East peace process.

Liel said Israel has established better relations with the African National Congress since last September, when Israel signed the self-rule accord with the PLO.

In fact, some 20 Israelis were in South Africa over the past week to help monitor the country's elections. Six were part of an official United Nations monitoring team.

The UN monitors included three Knesset members: Naomi Chazan of Meretz, Saleh Tareef of Labor and Eliezer Sandberg of Tsomet.

The other monitors included former refusenik Natan Sharansky, Prof. Itzhak Galnoor, a prominent academic, and Arik Bachar, foreign editor of the Hebrew daily newspaper Ma'ariv.

Two of the monitors have close connections with prominent Jewish South Africans.

Chaim Slovo, commissioner for the southern region in Israel's Interior Ministry, is a cousin of Joe Slovo, chair of the South African Communist Party and a leading figure in the African National Congress.

Another Israeli monitor, Nicole Goldstone, is the daughter of Judge Richard Goldstone, who has played a pivotal role in the transition in this country as head of a commission of inquiry, bearing his name, into the causes of violence in South Africa.

JIAS tries to help Russian family

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A last ditch effort to save a Russian Jewish family of four from deportation is being made by the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS).

The deportation order, signed April 26, is being appealed directly to Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi on the grounds of new information unearthed by Amnesty International about torture in their homeland of North Ossetia, said Susan Davis, JIAS national director.

Tribal warfare is rife in North Ossetia on the border of Georgia and the family fears for their lives if they are deported.

Felix Gogniev, 56, an economist, his ex-wife Dina Tsallaeva, their daughter, Tima, 27, and another daughter, Zalina, 25, must leave Canada by May 26. They have been in Canada on visitors' visas since 1991.

Zalina refused to sign the deportation order on the grounds she married a Canadian citizen, Gera Roth, in August, 1992, and has a permit authorizing her to work. However, Immigraton Department adjudicator Sylvanna Gratton said she will still be deported.

Tima Gogniev became ill at the deportation hearing and was excused by Gratton. However, she must reappear May 5 and as the evidence is the same in her case, the deportation order against her is only a formality.

Though Gratton said the deportation orders do not prevent the minister of immigration from interceding on humanitarian grounds, Vern Greco, the department's representative at the hearing, told the hearing that late last week he was told that the minister's office did not intend to take any action at this time.

Gogniev and Tsallaeva told the original Refugee Board hearing that they were tortured by anti-Semites in North Ossetia. Gratton refused Gogniev the right to make a statement about his torture, saying her obligation is only to rule on whether she should make an order for deportation or an order for departure. The much more stringent order of deportation she issued does not allow the Gognievs to reapply for admission to Canada without the minister's permission.

None of the Gognievs have passports and they told Gratton they do not know what country will admit them. Their counsel, Christine Kurata, said "their own country dissolved beneath their feet as the result of events in Russia."

Gogniev told the adjudicator that he does not wish to go to Israel because of recent events there.

"They are extremely fearful of what will happen to them if they are deported to Russia," said Davis.

Both Gogniev and Tsallaeva told the hearing that they have voluntarily given up their right to welfare. All four said that if deported they will apply to come back to Canada. Tsallaeva said she has become familiar with the Canadian way of life and now has a Canadian son-in-law. When he signed the deportation order, Gogniev wrote a note on it that he was doing so because he had no choice, but he is not angry with Canada or Canadians. He worked for several months as a volunteer at the Ontario Ministry of the Environment, and fellow workers there have backed his plea to stay in Canada.

The board which turned down their original application as refugees said there was no proof they would be persecuted if returned to Russia and that they had not proven their Jewish origin beyond doubt.

Kurata said the deportation order will be appealed.

Carleton school board rejects request to delay academic year

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Carleton Board of Education, which operates suburban and rural schools outside Ottawa, has rejected a request by the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa to delay the first day of school until Sept. 8.

The board was asked to change the school start date so Jewish students, who will be observing Rosh Hashanah on Sept. 6 and 7, will not miss orientation, when teachers assign books, desks, lockers and schedules.

A few weeks ago, trustees at the neighboring Ottawa Board of Education, on the advice of their multiculturalism advisory committee, voted to delay the school start date.

Only one trustee, Brian Mackey, voted against the move, saying a secular school board should not alter its schedule for religious reasons. He was also concerned that once the board set a precedent, other religious minorities would ask schools to close on religious holy days.

Indeed, a week later, the Ottawa Muslim association sparked a public debate when it applauded the decision to delay school for Rosh Hashanah and announced that it would ask the Ottawa Board of Education to close schools for two annual Muslim holy days. Trustees did not discuss or act on the formal request at a board meeting last week.

Ron Singer, chair of the community relations committee of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, assured Carleton Board of Education trustees that Rosh Hashanah would only coincide with the first day of school every 30 to 40 years. The Jewish Community Council, he said, did not support permanently closing schools for minority holy days. He compared delaying the school start date to the Board practice of not scheduling exams or graduation on holy days.

"There is a clear distinction between rescheduling the opening date of school two times each century and shutting down the public school system for minority holy days on an annual basis," Singer said.

Several Carleton trustees argued the first day of school was not especially important. One trustee used school attendance figures to show that 10 per cent of the board's students are absent on any given day, including the first one. Others said they were concerned that a decision to delay school would set a precedent.

"The only precedent this sets is that flexibility can be exercised when faced with unusual circumstances," Singer told them.

In a 12-5 vote, trustees voted to open schools Sept. 6, but to repeat orientation for Jewish students when they come to class on Sept. 8.

Singer said he was disappointed with the decision and that repeating orientation will waste classroom time.

The Metro Toronto-area Etobicoke Board of Education last week voted to accommodate Jewish students and staff by delaying the start of the school year to Sept 8.

With the vote, the Etobicoke board became the fifth of six Metro public school boards to delay the year until after Rosh Hashanah.

In Metro, only the Scarborough Board of Education has rejected pleas from Jewish groups to accommodate the Jewish new year, and will start classes Sept. 6, the first day of Rosh Hashanah.

The York Region Board of Education, north of Metro Toronto, will also begin classes Sept. 8.

The vote by the Etobicoke board came after submissions from Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith.

The board's decision is "an example of being flexible in terms of meeting the requirements of a diverse population," said CJC's Steve Shulman.

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) has requested an "urgent" meeting with Parti Quebecois leader Jacques Parizeau to clarify his party's position on minority rights.

BBC is concerned about Parizeau's description of the PQ's goal of integrating ethnic groups into the francophone majority, made to the recent Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region plenary [CJN, April 28].

BBC's League for Human Rights Quebec region chair Allan Adel said the way Parizeau expressed his hope of creating a Quebec where everyone speaks French raises many questions.

BBC would like to know how this goal can be reconciled with the PQ's other recent statement, that it wants minorities to feel a part of Quebec, he said.

The letter to Parizeau reads: "We believe that all citizens of Quebec have a vital role to play in Quebec's future, and have sought to build bridges between different groups to this end."

BBC wants to hear firsthand from Parizeau where the party stands on minority rights and immigration "so that, if indeed there have been misunderstandings between us in this regard, these be promptly clarified."

The letter is signed by Rabbi Sidney Shoham, national vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, and Adel, a lawyer.

"Integration can mean different things to different people," Adel told The CJN. "It may mean that for the PQ integration takes priority over the multicultural diversity that is Montreal today."

Adel said he did not want to "draw any conclusion" from Parizeau's exclusive use of French in his address to the plenary, but added, "some people wonder what message he is trying to send. It seems to be a change from his previous behavior. Was it haphazard or was it a sign?"

In other reaction, Robert Libman, the independent MNA for D'Arcy McGee, issued a statement blasting Parizeau for delivering an "insult" to minorities.

Parizeau's "decision to deliberately avoid uttering a single word in English before a predominantly English-speaking audience ... speaks clearly of the PQ's insensitivity toward non-francophone Quebecers."

D'Arcy McGee Liberal candidate Lawrence Bergman charged that Parizeau's French-only address has brought "shame" and "embarrassment" to the Parti Quebecois and all Quebecers and he should apologize to the Montreal Jewish community and the Quebec population as a whole.

"Mr. Parizeau lost an opportunity to make some friends, if not allies, in the Jewish community by his inexplicable behavior," Bergman said in a prepared statement.

As for Parizeau's explanation that he spoke in French because he had been invited in an "official capacity," Bergman commented: "What an outrageous excuse to hide behind. I wonder what he would be capable of in a more authoritative capacity?"

Bosnian Jewish woman recalls flight from war-torn Sarajevo

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Three months ago, Rachela Dzidic and her husband did what most of Sarajevo's citizens cannot do. They got out.

Dzidic, a Bosnian Jew, was in Ottawa last week to tell the story of her evacuation by the United Israel Appeal and the American Joint Distribution Committee to UIA leaders at the United Israel Appeal National Campaign Leadership Conference.

Dzidic said the 700 Sarajevo Jews were given a year's warning that war might break out in Bosnia by an official from the Jewish Agency in Israel. He urged them to leave the country. But Dzidic, an electrical engineer, said she and her husband weren't prepared to abandon their home and move to a country where they didn't speak the language.

"We had such a nice life there. We had our possessions, we had houses and apartments. The younger ones thought it was just propaganda to take people to Israel," she said.

When the war actually started in April 1992, the UIA and JDC organized an evacuation of Sarajevo Jews to Belgrade. Dzidic and her family were still not prepared to go. Her distraught father, a Holocaust survivor, gathered the family together. Dzidic said it was one of the few times she had seen her father cry.

"He said, 'Why is this happening to me again? First I couldn't persuade my parents to leave during World War II, and no one survived except for me. And now my children will not listen.'"

If his children refused to leave Sarajevo, he said, he would go himself and take all his grandchildren with him. Dzidic and her husband gave in.

Her two sons, Horace, 9 and Dennis, 11, her father, her sister and her sister's children left for what everyone believed would be a short visit with an uncle in Belgrade. Only 20 days later, the Serbian army surrounded Sarajevo, trapping Dzidic and her husband.

Children went to Israel

When it became clear that international forces were not going to get involved, the children went to Israel on a youth aliyah program. They left in June 1992.

They kept in touch by phone. When the Serbian army cut the phone lines, the Jewish Agency in Israel arranged for the children to say a few words to their parents on radio every Friday evening before Shabbat.

"It was only enough to hear them saying, 'How are you mommy, when are you coming?' but it meant so much to us," Dzidic said. "We knew that they were well and they knew we were alive."

In the meantime, Dzidic and her husband adjusted to life in a beseiged city. They stood in line for hours to get water. When the temperature hovered at -20 C, Dzidic's husband made a stove out of metal bookshelves and burned scraps of carpet, old clothes and shoes to keep warm. The couple were lucky enough to get food and medical supplies through the Jewish community centre.

"We were the only lucky ones [in the city] who knew that our suffering would end, " Dzidic said.

When a shell exploded in their apartment one day, the Dzidics decided the time had come to get out. They bribed local officials to get exit papers, and taking two suitcases and $1,200, joined a community-sponsored bus convoy leaving Sarajevo along with Bosnian Serbs. The Jewish evacuees went on to Israel; the Serbs stayed behind in safe territory as Bosnian refugees.

Three months ago, in February 1994, the Dzidics arrived in Israel on what they say was the happiest day of their lives.

"We saw our two sons, and they were so good looking, and so happy. We embraced, and kissed and walked and cried."

The family moved into a small apartment, complete with well-stocked fridge, at an absorption centre. Dzidic had nothing but praise for the organizations that helped her escape Sarajevo and ease the family's adjustment to Israel.

"My message to you all," Dzidic told moist-eyed UIA leaders, "is that you have changed history. For once in the whole Jewish history, it turned out to be good to be a Jew."

CBC threatened with lawsuit for report on Winnipeg rabbi

CJN Staff

TORONTO — The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) has been threatened with a lawsuit for defamation as a result of a report it aired which made a number of allegations against a former Winnipeg rabbi and educator.

A "Notice of Action" delivered to the CBC claims that the broadcast contained false and defamatory statements about Rabbi Ephraim Bryks, said Daniel Henry, senior legal counsel for the CBC.

The CBC has not made any formal response to the notice, he said. Instead, it has written to Rabbi Bryks' lawyer, Harvey Pollock, requesting further information. "I've asked for more precision in the notice as to which assertions in the program they are claiming as false and defamatory," Henry said. "It was a long broadcast and a lot of information was contained in it."

The notice stems from a CBC report titled "Unorthodox Conduct" broadcast in Winnipeg and later nationally three times in late February and early March.

The CBC report interviewed parents of three children who had been students of Rabbi Bryks during his tenure as head of the Torah Academy, which ended in 1990. Among those were Martin Levin and Kaye (Sara) Levin, the parents of Daniel Levin, who committed suicide on Yom Kippur last year, when he was 17. The other parents in the documentary were unidentified.

Both Levins were named in the legal notice, Henry said.

Under Manitoba's Defamation Act, the notice is intended to give an opportunity for a retraction or an apology, he added.

When contacted by The CJN, Pollock declined to comment.

In 1988, Winnipeg South Child and Family Services investigated complaints regarding the rabbi. According to the provincial Department of Community Services, the agency investigation found no evidence of criminal wrongdoing and "insufficient evidence to pursue any proceeding under the Child and Family Services Act."

But it did find that "the acknowledged interaction of Rabbi Bryks with his female students involving tickling at the waist, kissing on the head, hugging, and students sitting on his lap were neither appropriate nor professional behavior."

As reported in the Winnipeg Free Press at the time, Rabbi Bryks said his style of teaching was warm and personal, but not inappropriate.

"This school welcomes that kind of conduct because that's what this school is," he is quoted as saying. "It's a warm, affectionate place for children."

Rabbi Bryks left Winnipeg in 1990, leaving behind a legacy of division and discord. He had been in Winnipeg since 1978, serving as spiritual leader of the Orthodox Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Congregation. He started the Torah Academy as an alternative to the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education schools. Enrollment peaked at about 150-160 students.

When the allegations that prompted the Winnipeg South Child and Family Services investigation surfaced, the school became divided. Some parents came to Rabbi Bryks' defence while others pulled their children out. Enrollment dropped by about 50 percent in the aftermath of the controversy and 20 to 30 families left to form their own Orthodox congregation.

Rabbi Bryks is currently serving as principal of another Torah Academy he helped establish in Queen's, New York for Russian Jewish immigrant teens studying in Grades 7 to 12.

Ottawa planning measures against hate crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government is formulating legislation to make "hate motivation" an aggravating factor in the sentence imposed for criminal offences but it is not considering collecting statistics on the racial origins of criminals, federal Solicitor General Herb Gray said recently.

Speaking to a conference on hate crimes held in Ottawa, Gray added,"We are currently looking at ways to support the law enforcement community's efforts against hate crime."

In his formal address to the conference, Gray referred to Liberal MP Shirley Maheu's private member's bill that calls on Ottawa to collect statistics on hate crimes. "A number of community groups have asked for such legislation, and this is something I will be looking into," he said.

Internal round table

Speaking to reporters afterwards, Gray said national statistics on the victims of hate crimes would help throw some light on the extent of the problem in Canada. However, he opposed collecting statistics on the origins of perpetrators.

"I'm not persuaded that simply talking about ethnic origins is relevant to what's happening," he said.

"You have to be careful not to collect statistics in a way which creates stereotypes or which stigmatizes an entire group."

Gray said the government would be following through on its promise in the Liberal Party Red Book to take measures to combat racism and hate crime.

He said the government is "working on the establishment of an internal round table, headed by a minister and staffed by experts and other Canadians, to work towards developing solutions to the problems related to hate crime.

In addition, the Department of Canadian Heritage is attempting to educate young people about racism by distributing materials to students and teachers on the issue.

The RCMP, which comes under his ministry, "actively works to collect and share hate crime information with police services across the country," Gray added.

Commenting on the extent of hate-motivated crimes, Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Bernie Farber said, "Hate groups are now permeating and pushing into the youth of our country. Ten years ago this wasn't a problem."

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Among the handful of what are considered Jewish institutions in Canada is Montreal's Baron Byng High School, immortalized in Mordecai Richler novels and claiming such alumni as Richler himself, poets A.M. Klein and Irving Layton and the late federal NDP leader David Lewis.

Baron Byng's class of 1944 was a remarkably homogeneous group. It was 100 per cent Jewish, the children of immigrants, mostly working class and growing up in Montreal's St. Urbain Street "ghetto."

They went to high school against the backdrop of World War II. Possessing youthful optimism, they desperately wanted to integrate into the Canadian mainstream, and to succeed.

Fifty years later, as they enter retirement, history shows the great majority did so.

Lawyer John Liberman, who heads the organizing committee, said all but one of the 95 kids in the class are accounted for, including five who are deceased. The missing one is Richard Davis, believed to have been a lawyer in Los Angeles.

A surviving teacher has also been tracked down, math instructor Amos Saunders, now 100 and living in Victoria, B.C. He's sent a letter for the reunion.

The class excelled academically; 82 of the 95 graduated on time (some dropped out to join the Army). The number going on to university was exceptionally high for the era and given that at McGill University, at least, Jews had to have higher grade averages to get in.

"I'll never forget the registrar of McGill coming to school and telling us what we are doing is motivating you to do well by setting higher standards," Liberman said.

It worked. About half of his homeroom class was accepted at McGill. Not only did Liberman earn a law degree, but also two bachelor and two master's degrees.

Isadore (Don) Albin, another organizer, has counted nine medical doctors, four lawyers and a high number of assorted scientists and professors. (Albin was an anomaly among his classmates — he went into the newspaper trade, starting at Canadian Press as a copy boy.)

Between 60-70 per cent of the class still lives in Montreal. The rest are scattered around the United States, Canada and Israel.

Among the prominent alumni are the late psychologist Sam Rabinovitch, who established the McGill Learning Centre; playwright Aviva Ravel; architect Harry Stilman; diplomat Robert Lederman; the late Harry Gonshor, a mathematician at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Myer Katz, former director of the McGill Social Work School; Ben Sedlezky, a pioneer in periodontics, now pursuing a fine arts degree; and biochemist Bernard Weigensberg.

It also produced an adventurer, Manny Weinstein, who is now Capt. L.E. Vongard. He changed his name while captaining ships carrying Jewish refugees through the British blockade of Palestine. Apparently, some of his missions took him through the Suez and he did not want to be identifiable as Jewish.

Baron Byng, which closed about 15 years ago, was a Protestant school and most of its teachers during the mid '40s were World War I veterans of British extraction with a remarkable dedication to teaching.

Not only do the graduates of that era feel they received a first-rate education, but they also now appreciate the role their teachers played in helping them make the transition from the world of their Yiddish-speaking parents to that of the new world, Albin said.

"They knew they had to help push us into this society, where we would not readily be accepted. They did a superb job."

They fondly remember art teacher Ann Savage and music teacher D. M. Herbert, who introduced them to a cultural life of which they had known nothing. Participation in Herbert's choir, for example, was virtually 100 per cent.

Boys and girls were segregated and rarely made contact with one another, even in the halls, recalled another organizer Sarah Kostisky Chad. They all did get together at the graduation dance, when she remembers the girls had to wear short dresses rather than long gowns because of the shortage of fabric during the war.

Boys were reminded that they might soon have to serve. Membership in the air cadets was compulsory and they had to take course in aircraft reconaissance and navigation.

Just staying in school was a sacrifice for their families.

In their spare time, many had part-time jobs. Liberman worked at the Steinberg's grocery at the corner of Bernard and Jeanne Mance after school Fridays until 11:30 p.m. and Saturdays from 8 a.m. to midnight, all for $2.50.

He thought it was good pay because you could buy a hot dog and a drink at Fried's store for a nickel, and seven streetcar tickets for a quarter.

Although most have not kept in touch over the years, Chad said she was amazed at how easily she could pick up where she had left off with classmates she had not seen in a half-century.

She did not even recognize Liberman when they came together to organize the reunion, but no one would know it by the way they talk about their school days.

Jewish groups want Supreme Court to rehear part of war crimes case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Jewish organizations are asking the Supreme Court of Canada to rehear portions of the Imre Finta war crimes case.

B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA) say that the High Court may have been misled into accepting an argument that would permit an accused war criminal to argue, in effect, that he was merely acting in conformity with anti-Jewish attitudes that were commonly held at the time.

The effect of the court's judgment could be interpreted to mean that anti-Semitism might be raised as a defence to war crimes, say legal documents filed with the High Court.

"Anti-Semitism can never be a legal excuse for the Holocaust," said a document submitted by B'nai Brith. "Racial prejudice can never be a defence to crimes against humanity. Yet the court appears to suggest they can be.

"To allow subjectively felt racial prejudice against a victim group to stand as a defence to crimes against humanity is so antithetical to international standards. . . is so outrageous, illogical and senseless that. . . the court could not possibly have meant it, even though the court appears to have said it," the document argues.

Finta, a former Hungarian gendarmerie captain, was acquitted of charges of robbery, forcible confinement, kidnapping and manslaughter in connection with the 1944 roundup and deportation of 8,617 Jews in the city of Szeged.

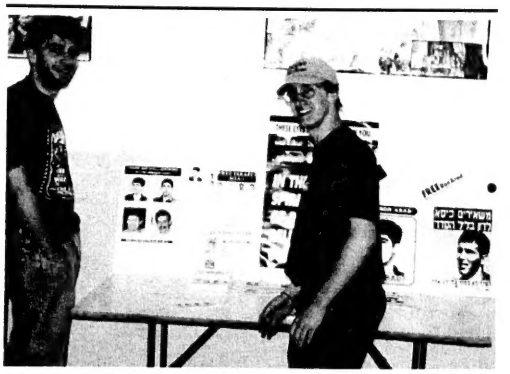
While the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the war crimes legislation, its rulings on esoteric areas of procedure have been criticized by Jewish groups and Justice Department prosecutors for making future criminal prosecutions extremely difficult.

B'nai Brith, which along with the CHRA was an intervener in the case, notes that the court cited a wartime Hungarian newspaper article as lending an "air of reality" to Finta's defence that he did not have the guilty mind to be convicted of war crimes. The article repeated numerous anti-Semitic canards that Jews were hostile to the country, were leftists, and were idle parasites and profiteers, B'nai Brith notes.

The court's decision seems to suggest that someone who commits crimes believing that Jews were hostile to Hungary may not have had the requisite mental intent to make their actions a war crime, B'nai Brith argues.

That sort of reasoning would excuse the very actions the war crimes legislation was meant to address, the documents say.

The CHRA argues that if the Supreme Court does not rehear that aspect of the case it would "leave open the future use of propaganda promoting hatred and distrust of Jews as part of a defence for atrocities which would otherwise be punishable. Virtually every accused would be able to point to such propaganda as a basis for his defence and possible acquittal by a jury."



CYJ EDUCATIONAL CAMPAIGN

Canadian Young Judaea recently conducted an educational campaign across Canada. The campaign focused on the fate of Israeli airman Ron Arad, held prisoner since 1986 and three Israeli soldiers, Zachary Baumel, Yehuda Katz and Zvi Feldman, who have been missing in action since 1982. The campaign culminated in a one day event in which people were asked to sign a petition with reference to the Israeli soldiers missin in action. Seen at the JCC North in Toronto are (from left) Canadian Young Judaea members Jordy Koffman and Stuart Lapowich. The petition forms were sent to Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

Jerusalem celebrates reunification

Dear Friends
Shalom from Jerusalem!

As the Mayor of Jerusalem, I wish to take this opportunity to express my appreciation and thanks to all of you who have gathered together, and to join with you in solidarity to celebrate Jerusalem Day, the 27th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem.

Ehud Olmert

Jerusalem, the world's most intriguing and complex city, a place where East meets West and ancient intermingles with modern, shall remain forever a united, unique city, and the capital of the sovereign State of Israel.

Despite the never-ending challenges and difficulties facing Jerusalem, we are seeking ways to encourage economic growth, industry and technology on one hand, while preserving our rich history, spirituality and beauty on the other.

In 1996, we will be marking the 3000th anniversary since King David made Jerusalem his capital and the religious and political centre of the Jewish nation. We are committed to safeguarding this status. We are also committed to insuring that it will not be open to negotiations, while protecting the rights of all residents in the administration of this modern city.

I welcome you all to visit us and experience Jerusalem for yourself.

Ki mitzion tetze Torah, u'dvar Hashem miyerushalyim . . . Truly out of Zion, shall come forth Torah and the Word of the Lord out of Jerusalem.

Ehud Olmert
Mayor of Jerusalem

Women push for changes to the get

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — A group of women demonstrated here last week to support the rights of agunot — women whose husbands refuse to grant them religious divorces.

Protesting last Thursday in front of the offices of the Rabbinical Council here, a group of women who are barred from remarrying charged that the rabbinate is not willing to force their husbands to grant divorces.

There are an estimated 50,000 women in Israel who are locked into marriages that exist in name alone and who cannot remarry because their husbands refuse to divorce them or have disappeared.

There are no civil marriages in Israel. According to religious law, only the husband can initiate divorce proceedings.

Na'amat, a women's group that organized the demonstration, wants rabbis to take a stronger line with recalcitrant husbands and to agree to a form of civil marriage for women seeking to remarry.

There was no immediate response from the Rabbinical Council.

One of the demonstrators said her husband has refused to grant her a divorce since 1957.

"All our property is registered under the name of his girlfriend. She's accepted as his common-law wife, while I and my children starve," said Vicky Levy.

Keren Simantov's husband has sworn he will never give her a divorce.

"The case has been in the courts for 13 years. Every time I come before the rabbis and scream at them, they say I must be patient and that with G-d's help, it will all come out right. But it doesn't," Simantov said.

Two months ago, the rabbis offered her husband some $1,650 (U.S.) if he would agree to divorce his wife. The husband reportedly rejected the offer.

PLO members sentenced

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Three Khan Yunis men who were sent to Israel to murder Jews as an "admissions test" to the PLO's Fatah Hawks were sentenced last week to jail sentences ranging from 17 to 20 years by Tel Aviv District Court.

One of them, Salame Barbah, had been released from jail three months prior to an attack on a Jewish man as part of the agreement between the government and the PLO, the court was told.

Barbah, 20, Matzbah Barbah, 25, and a 17-year-old were convicted of the attempted murder of 65-year-old Avraham Shifrut, whom they attacked while Shifrut was reading his newspaper on the Bat Yam beach.

Salame Barbah has previous convictions for hurling stones and firebombs, and was recently released after serving only one year of a five-year sentence as part of an agreement between the government and the PLO.

He was sentenced to 20 years imprisonment, while his co-defendants received 17 years each.

A MOMENT OF PRAYER

Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert (left) and the Rev. Jesse Jackson join hands in prayer before the Western Wall during the U.S. black leader's six-day visit to Israel and the territories last month. Jackson was invited by both the Israeli government and by PLO chairman Yasser Arafat and Hebron University. During a round of functions on both sides of the Green Line, Jackson spent an hour and a half with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in the presence of U.S. Ambassador Edward Djerejian. Jackson's visit was seen by Israeli political observers as an effort by Israel to cultivate its own relationships with an increasingly powerful black U.S. political leadership at a time of heightened tensions between Jews and blacks in the United States. Israeli opposition leaders slam plans for peace with Syria

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher was presenting Syrian President Hafez Assad with new Israeli peace proposals last weekend, Israeli opposition leaders here condemned the plan as a betrayal of the State of Israel.

After meeting with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on Friday, Christopher flew to Damascus, where he met with Assad on Saturday and again Sunday evening.

Christopher, believing that negotiations between Israel and the PLO were well on their way to a successful conclusion this week, was eager to take advantage of momentum in the peace process by trying to bring Jerusalem and Damascus closer.

Israeli-Syrian negotiations have dragged on for months without any progress, and were suspended entirely by Assad in the wake of the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre.

During his meeting with Assad, Christopher conveyed Rabin's new proposals for peace with Syria.

The proposals reportedly call for a phased Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights over a period of eight years, in exchange for the establishment of a full peace between Israel and Syria, complete with open borders, free trade and the exchange of ambassadors.

No concessions on Golan

Christopher returned to Israel on Monday with Assad's response to Rabin's proposals.

But Israeli opposition leaders had their own responses Sunday — and they were far from positive.

Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of the opposition Likud party, accused Rabin of having "perpetrated the greatest political fraud ever in the history of our state."

Rafael Eitan, a former army chief of staff who heads the right-wing opposition Tsomet party, said no concessions should be made on the Golan.

"Our border with Syria has been peaceful all the time because Syria needs peace as much as we do. We are a two-hour tank ride from Damascus," said Eitan.

Israel, which captured the Golan in the 1967 Six-Day War, has long considered the strategic plateau as crucial to its security needs, though some Israeli generals have argued more recently that demilitarization of the region would assure Israeli security.

Rabin, countering a barrage of recent right-wing criticism of his efforts to re-establish negotiations with Syria, has said in recent months that he would call for a national referendum before offering to make any major withdrawal from the Golan in exchange for peace with Damascus.

Debate on Golan gets nasty as attacks on Rabin mount

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A bill that would have required Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to get two-thirds support from the Knesset before returning any portion of the Golan Heights to Syria was voted down last week.

Knesset members defeated the bill by a vote of 57 to 46.

The bill had been introduced by Likud member Uzi Landau and National Religious Party leader Yitzhak Levy.

The debate prior to the voting was marked by vitriolic attacks against Rabin, who has recently stated that peace with Syria is more important than maintaining every settlement on the Golan.

Rabin has also stated recently that he would hold a national referendum before making any significant Israeli withdrawal from the Golan.

Syria has demanded the return of the Golan in exchange for any peace deal with Israel.

Police Minister Moshe Shahal, who responded for the government, said Israel does not claim sovereignty over the Golan.

The law annexing Jerusalem includes the word "sovereignty," he said, but the law annexing the Golan does not.

He noted that Likud leaders, such as former prime minister Menachem Begin and former defence minister Moshe Arens, had said the law annexing the Golan would not stand in the way of negotiations with the Syrians.

Referring to Rabin's two-pack-a-day cigarette habit, Landau said the prime minister "suffers permanently from nicotine poisoning," which, according to Landau, has impaired Rabin's mental capacity.

That remark proved too much for Rabin's deputy at the Defence Ministry, former army chief of staff Mordechai Gur, who led the capture of east Jerusalem during the 1967 Six-Day War, when Rabin was chief of staff.

Gur jumped to his feet, demanding that Landau retract the comment and insisting the Knesset stenographers delete the remarks.

In reference to the failing health of Begin in the last months he served as prime minister, Rabin supporters called out: "What about Begin? For a whole year, you in the Likud covered up for him when he was so sick that he was absolutely out of action!"

Israel set to release 5,000 PLO prisoners

• Israel will release 5,000 PLO prisoners upon the signing of the agreement or immediately afterward. Israel also has agreed to release thousands of prisoners of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement — but not those guilty of actual attacks on Israelis — as long as they provide a written pledge to refrain from future violence, to support the peace process and to accept the PLO's authority.

According to Israeli observers, none of the Hamas prisoners is likely to accept these terms; and so they will remain behind bars for the time being.

For its part, however, the PLO will gain political points in the territories for having negotiated terms for the release of Hamas members, thereby demonstrating its concern for all Palestinian prisoners, not just its own adherents.

In Paris, meanwhile, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators signed an agreement last Friday establishing the terms of economic relations between the two parties.

The 60-page agreement, signed after eight rounds of negotiations in the French capital, calls for open borders between Israel and the areas falling under Palestinian authority, and allows for the free movement of labor, services, most agricultural products and other goods between the two sides.

The agreement stipulates that Israel and the Palestinian authority will have similar policies regarding imports and customs.

The Palestinians will be able to import goods from Arab and Islamic countries in limited quantities.

Agricultural produce from Gaza and Jericho will enter Israel freely, except for five goods on which import quotas have been imposed for five years: tomatoes, cucumbers, potatoes, eggs and poultry.

The two customs authorities will jointly operate the border crossing in Jericho and Gaza.

The Palestinians will establish a monetary authority regulating and supervising all banks operating within its area of authority.

The two sides agreed to continue to discuss alternatives to a Palestinian currency. Until then, the Israeli shekel will continue to constitute legal tender in Gaza and Jericho, "side by side with other currencies," according to the agreement.

The Palestinian Tax Administration will conduct its own direct tax policy. Israel agreed to transfer to the Palestinians 75 per cent of income tax revenues collected from Palestinians employed in Israel.

It was also agreed that the Palestinians will establish a value-added tax system similar to that currently employed in Israel.

The agreement calls for the Palestinians to establish their own social security system.

It also calls for the Palestinians to set up their own tourist administration and allows tourists to move freely between Israel and the autonomous areas.

At last Sunday's weekly cabinet meeting, there was concern over the worsening economic situation in Gaza, whose work force has been hard hit by the closure of the territories that Israel imposed, following a series of suicide attacks that claimed the lives of 13 Israelis last month.

A number of steps to ease the closure have been introduced, but the closure will continue even after the start of the autonomy, Rabin said.

Later this week, the first contingents of Palestinian police were due to take up their posts in Jericho and Gaza: 500 going to Jericho and 1,500 to Gaza, complete with arms, jeeps and light-armored personnel carriers.

Also due to arrive in Jericho were administrative personnel from the PLO's Tunis headquarters. Contingents from the organization's security services were scheduled to arrive soon in Gaza and Jericho.

Yet even as these final arrangements were being made, talks were still proceeding in Cairo on some outstanding issues, including control of the territorial waters off Gaza and the granting of pardons by the PLO to those who have collaborated with the Israeli authorities.

Changes in travel arrangements in the Jericho area were to go into effect this week.

The Israel Defence Force commander for the central sector told Israeli settlers in the Jordan Rift north of Jericho on Sunday that they would no longer be allowed to drive through Jericho, and that if they wanted to travel to Jerusalem, they would have to use an alternative road network.

Settlers in both Gaza and the West Bank were increasingly nervous about their future as the date for the autonomy nears.

In the township of Kiryat Malachi, north of Gaza, anti-government feeling was running high, with residents protesting what they believe to be the government's intention to make the highway that runs past their township available for Palestinian passage.

Russian crisis strong reality

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Brace yourselves to respond to a crisis at any time, an expert in Russian history and politics warned delegates at the United Israel Appeal National Campaign Leadership Conference in Ottawa last week.

It could take a generation before the countries of eastern Europe recover from the turmoil that has followed the break-up of the Soviet Union, said Allen Pollack, a professor from New York state who is currently writing a book about the collapse of the former Soviet Union.

"People are not quite sure what's coming next," he told delegates. "Much of what they held onto that guaranteed their own security and self-identity is no longer there. And they are frightened and worried and unclear of what is coming next. Times like that are historically very, very dangerous for our people."

During times of rapid social change, people look for scapegoats, he said, and historically Jews have been the targets.

"It should give nobody any joy to say that the only reason there have not been mass pogroms in eastern Europe is because so far everybody has found somebody that they hate even more than they hate the Jews," Pollack said.

Pollack blamed the current racist and ethnic conflicts on communist leaders who have used nationalism to hold onto power by diverting attention away from their own failure to manage the economy.

Pollack identified four areas Jews should watch. The first is Hungary, which a few years ago was the most moderate, democratic country in the Soviet bloc. But economic reforms have not progressed well, Pollack said, and the people have become more nationalistic. Moreover, since Hungary was divided after World War II, there are pockets of Hungarians living in neighbouring countries.

"You have more than a million Hungarians now living in Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia. If you want to have an ultranationalist [leader] diverting attention in Hungary by talking about the need to take care of Hungarians, you have a formula for potential calamity."

In the event that ethnic conflicts erupt in Hungary, its 200,000 Jews will be threatened. And, he added, 200,000 is a conservative estimate.

"As this nationalism turns to racism and violence, the number of people who will be identified as Jews is going to be going up."

A second area to watch are those countries of the former Soviet Union where thousands of Jews live amidst Muslim majorities.

"Israel is desperately trying to help the present regimes of these countries hold on, because if they [do], they will become like Turkey — moderate majority Muslim populations being transformed into societies that can deal with the modern world. If they lose, we are going to have Islamic fundamentalists that are going to dominate ... It will be a catastrophe for the whole world."

A third area of concern is Russia and Ukraine, where there is a long tradition of anti-Semitism.

And finally, he said, we have to worry about the small towns in eastern Europe.

"In times of social distress like this, the smaller the community, the greater the danger because any attacks will not be reported [in the international press]."

Pollack predicted the years of social upheaval will see large migrations of Jews. When it's over, the Jewish world will be concentrated in North America and Israel.

He advised United Jewish Appeal leaders to be ready to evacuate Jews at any time. In the meantime, he encouraged them to spend their money on educational programs like summer camps and contact with Israeli shlichim (emissaries) that build Jewish identity. The worst way to spend limited resources, Pollack said, is to put up buildings to house Jewish organizations.

If Jews can stay peacefully in their communities, they will be better Jews, he said. If not, they might learn enough about Jewish history to know to leave before it becomes to late. Pollack, who for many years worked in the United Israel Appeal Office in Israel, said networks are in place in Eastern Europe to help Jews if there is a crisis.

"Take a deep breath, " Pollack warned. "We're in this for the long run."

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

MASLO — MASLIN — MASLYANKA

Today's names are "milchig." They are derived from the Russian word Maslo, which means butter.

Maslyanka is the word for buttermilk. Maslow is also a Polish village near Krakow.

MELTZ — MELTZER — BRAUER

Meltz (Mielce) in Ukraine is a shtetl near Rovno.

Maelz (pronounced Meltz) is also the German word for malt, an ingredient of beer. The Maeltzer supplied the Brauer (brewer).

BBW Okay Name Change

ORLANDO — B'nai Brith Women will enter its second century with a new name.

Delegates to the organization's recent biennial convention held here unanimously approved changing the name. A new name will be submitted to the delegates for a vote next spring, following consultation with the membership.

The volunteer philanthropic organization, which will celebrate its centenary in 1997, works locally, nationally and internationally on issues concerning women, children and Jewish values.

The organization claims 3,000 members in Canada.

"The Canadian delegation...[is] excited about the future of our organization. A new name will enable us to forge ahead in our work for women, children and families," said B'nai Brith Women of Canada president Arlene Fagan.

Eighth Victim of Afula Bomb

JERUSALEM — The eighth victim of the April 6 Afula suicide car-bombing died of her wounds last week.

Ahuva Cohen Onalla was buried in Ashkelon, her hometown, nearly three weeks after a member of Hamas carried out the bombing, which killed seven other Israelis and wounded more than 50.

But her husband Ad'il, an Arab, was not present at the funeral.

"I wanted her funeral to honor her. I am afraid that because of what my people did to my wife, some of her people will not tolerate my presence at the graveside and they will dishonor her memory," he said.

Ahuva had fought for her life since April 6, when she was badly burned in the car-bomb attack.

When Ad'il and Ahuva met, she was divorced and the mother of three children. Despite violent opposition from her family, she converted to Islam shortly before the Afula attack so that she and Ad'il could be married.

The family broke off all connection with her because of the marriage, but they did visit her at the hospital.

The Cohen family had been anxious that Ahuva be buried as a Jew, and Ad'il agreed.

He did so, he said, "for her sake, even though she did become a Muslim."

He also said he had agreed to stay away from the funeral on condition that the family raise no objections to his visiting his wife's grave in the future.

Arrests in Hadera Attack

JERUSALEM — Israeli security forces last week arrested a group of Palestinians believed responsible for planning the April 13 bombing of a bus in the central Israeli town of Hadera.

Five Israelis died in the attack and 29 were wounded when a suicide bomber boarded a bus at the Hadera terminal and set off explosives strapped to his body.

Israeli security officials arrested 27 Palestinians, said to be members of Hamas, on suspicion of involvement in the attack.

Also arrested were two Israeli Arabs suspected of driving the suicide bomber to Hadera. The two reportedly acted on orders from Hamas and were paid for their services.

Teens Arrested in Desecrations

PARIS — Police here have arrested two groups of youths for the desecration of two Jewish cemeteries in the eastern French province of Alsace.

The five young vandals, who range in age from 10 to 14, said they were not motivated by anti-Semitism.

The cemeteries are located in the villages of Merzwiller and Struth, near Strasbourg.

In Struth, 15 headstones were broken and at least 40 monuments were overturned. Three teens, ages 13 and 14, confessed to the crime.

In Merzwiller, where 12 headstones were broken, the two culprits are 10 and 12.

Russians Mark Hitler's Birthday

MOSCOW — A small group of Russian neo-Nazis celebrated Adolf Hitler's 105th birthday last month by marching through central Moscow chanting anti-Semitic slogans.

Wearing camouflage-print military outfits, the 15 neo-Nazis shouted "Sieg Heil" and "Death to the Jews," as well as "Death to Yeltsin" and "Long Live Russia," as they marched along Moscow's main road, Tverskaya Street, toward the Kremlin.

The march ended near Red Square, where a handful of police officers observed the demonstrators but did not intervene.

The neo-Nazis said they belonged to Alexander Barkashov's Russian National Unity Organization, which was active in last fall's armed resistance to President Boris Yeltsin and used arms to defend Parliament when lawmakers refused to follow Yeltsin's orders to disband.

And in St. Petersburg, neo-Nazis also marked the April 20 birthday. Ten members of Smerch, a group whose name means tornado, met that day in front of Kazansky Cathedral.

Agreement with Hungary, Slovakia

BUDAPEST — Jewish groups have reached agreements with the governments of Hungary and Slovakia for the restitution of Jewish property seized during the Holocaust.

The agreements reached late last month — the first such accords with former Communist countries in Eastern Europe — call for the return of Jewish property seized between 1939 and 1945 or for compensating the victims or their heirs for the value of the confiscated property.

Two weeks ago, Jewish groups in Hungary reached an accord with the Hungarian government that established principles governing the restitution process.

The Jewish community in Slovakia is drawing up a list of some 300 properties that it hopes to reclaim under the terms of the agreement.

Approximately 3,000 Jews live in Slovakia. Some 70,000 Jews from there perished during the Holocaust.

According to the World Jewish Congress, final details for returning property to Hungarian Jews could be completed within a month or two. But the actual restitution process could take up to several years.

In February, the Czech Republic voted down a bill that would have restored property seized during World War II to the members of that country's Jewish community.

Wiesenthal Documentary Premieres

AMSTERDAM — A documentary on the life of famed Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal premiered here last month.

Wiesenthal attended the April 19 opening, at which members of the invited audience included Dutch Crown Prince Willem Alexander and representatives of the embassies of the United States, Israel, Germany and Austria.

The film, titled Freedom is Not a Gift From Heaven But Has To Be Fought For, was made on the occasion of Wiesenthal's 85th birthday, which fell last Dec. 31.

The documentary will air on Dutch television this week and will also be broadcast in Germany.

Immigration Law Extended

WASHINGTON — To the relief of Jewish groups and their supporters on Capitol Hill, the U.S. Congress has decided to extend a law making it easier for Jews from the former Soviet republics to enter the United States.

A House-Senate conference committee decided recently to grant a two-year extension of the law, which eases the requirements on members of certain groups seeking to enter the United States as refugees.

Hamas Probe Sought

NEW YORK — The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations is calling on the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the House and Senate Intelligence Committees to investigate ties between Hamas terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and their supporters in America.

Lester Pollack, Conference chair, charged that Hamas has established "an international network of terror with direction from the United States."

Earlier this year, Canadian Jewish Congress called on Ottawa to investigate the possible activities of Hezbollah in Canada, following an order to deport a suspected member of the terrorist group.

Former SS Guard Leaves

WASHINGTON — Mathias Denuel, a resident of Naples, Fla., who admitted to serving as an SS guard at a division of the Mauthausen concentration camp during World War II, has permanently left the United States.

The Justice Department announced last Monday that Denuel, 74, a German citizen who did not take U.S. citizenship, left the United States from Miami for Germany, where he will reside.

The government initiated deportation proceedings against Denuel last August.

During World War II, Denuel was a member of the SS Death's Head Battalion, guarding prisoners at the Gusen concentration camp, the largest subdivision of Mauthausen.

According to the U.S. Office of Special Investigations, abundant evidence exists about atrocities committed against thousands of civilians at Gusen.

By RABBI PHILIP S. SCHEIM

A Midrash (Bereishit Rabba 65:20) preserves the minutes of a gathering of leaders of the nations of the world. They had invited a renowned consultant to the meeting, Bilaam ben Beor, the most sought-after prophet of those times. Their question to him: "Can we conquer the people of Israel?"

Bilaam answered: "Go pass by their synagogues and study houses. Should you find children's voices whistling there, you will never be able to conquer this people."

Bilaam was right. The secret to our survival has been the sound of the voices of Jewish children echoing from the Batei Midrash, the schools and study halls. It is our people's most precious sound, our greatest national resource. It is the sounds of children conversant in the language of their ancestors, knowledgeable in the melodies of Yiddishkeit, that let all of the other nations, friend and foe, know we are here for the long haul, that we are not going anywhere, that Israel is an eternal people.

Conversely, when our children's voices assume a non-Jewish character, when their idiom, their expressions, their concerns lose any Jewish connection, we are at risk. When our homes are devoid of Jewish books, Jewish symbols, Jewish ritual, we deprive our children of any hope of carrying a Jewish tune. When Jewish education focuses solely on the celebration of bar and bat mitzvah, with the minimum amount of learning in as little time as possible, we demean our past, trivialize our present and compromise our future.

Let us assume, hopefully, that we want our children to learn the melodies, the words, the spirit of our tradition. But we have to learn them first. We cannot expect our children to carry on any recognizable form of Jewish practice in their future homes, if they, at home, hear no melody, see no symbol, taste no tradition that link them to their Jewish souls.

We should know better. When all the superficiality of life is stripped away, either by history, by events, or by the recurring personal traumas and anxieties that we inevitably confront, it is our inner Jewish core that remains. The seriousness with which we pursue Jewish learning and Jewish living will determine the make-up of that core, and its ability to sustain us through all of life's moments, both good and bad.

My teacher, Rabbi Weiss Halivni, tells this story of his train ride to Auschwitz 50 years ago. It was, of course, a horrific journey into hell. The train reached its destination. The teenage boy David, in the midst of the nightmare, as he was being separated from his family forever, heard his aunt Ethel, a young woman in her 20s, call out to him: "Davidl: The Torah, over which you have labored so diligently — zol oif dir magen zayn — will protect you."

"I am that boy," Rabbi Halivni says, in telling the story half a century later, "and my aunt was right. It was the Torah that watched over me from one death camp to another. It is that Torah that still watches over me today."

As we prepare for Shavuot and its commemoration of the revelation of Torah through Moses at Sinai, we ought to consider God's charge to Joshua, spoken shortly after the death of Moses, and resonating in every Jewish generation since: "Do not let this Torah cease from your lips, rather, study it day and night . . . for only then will you truly prosper in your ways. Only then will you succeed." (Josh. 1:8)

Mayor of Paris presented with French Steinsaltz Talmud

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Seven and a half centuries after King Louis IX ordered all copies of the Talmud burned, the mayor of Paris was presented last week with the first French edition of the Steinsaltz Talmud.

At a ceremony attended by Chief Rabbi Rene Samuel Sirat and other French rabbis, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz handed the first volume of the French translation of the Talmud to Mayor Jacques Chirac.

The mayor, in turn, gave Rabbi Steinsaltz the Medal of Paris.

Chirac told the audience, "There is in the Talmud a particularly striking scene: The greatest of all prophets, Moses, listens to the teaching of the illustrious Rabbi Akiva and is astonished when he hears comments that he himself, the master par excellence, did not know.

"One cannot express in a better way the idea that the Talmud is an everlasting re-reading of the unfathomable Torah of Moses by qualified scholars," the mayor said.

He called Rabbi Steinsaltz "one of those doctors of the faith who, thanks to their intelligence, knowledge and wisdom enlighten the path of the Jewish people."

Leading rabbinical figure

In a reference to one of the greatest of all Jewish commentators, Chirac told Rabbi Steinsaltz, "You are regarded as one of the leading rabbinical figures of this century and the worthy successor of Rashi of Troyes."

The French version of the Steinsaltz Talmud is published by Jean-Claude Lattes with the help of the Fonds Social Juif Unifie, or the United Jewish Social Fund.

According to the bookshop Le Bibliophane, located in the ancient Jewish quarter of Paris, the first 150 available copies of the French edition of the Steinsaltz Talmud were sold out in a matter of hours.

The French version opens with the tractate Ketubot, or marriage contracts, and Rabbi Steinsaltz's handbook to the Talmud.

The Talmud is composed of six orders, which are further broken down into 63 tractates. In the original Hebrew and Aramaic, it consists of some 2.5 million words on 5,894 folio pages.

Two additional volumes of the French edition will be published every year during the coming decade.

If countdown starts for Gaza keep fingers crossed

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

The much advertised "spirit of Oslo" was almost lost in months of feet-dragging, and hope of agreeing on details as well as on the original timetable were nearly drowned in an ocean of mutual accusations. Now, exhaustion has returned the parties to the table and they appear to be inching towards implementation. Although this promises to be much harder now than it would have been earlier, when popular support in both camps was much stronger, the recognition that further postponement can only ruin the chances and plunge the region into turmoil, forces the parties to restart the countdown at phase one. But distrust still runs very high.

Yeshayahu Anug

In Israel, despite the fierce campaign of the opposition against any agreement with the PLO, the government senses that the majority of Israelis are eager to get rid of Gaza and have also accepted the transfer of Jericho to Palestinian administration. Thus, redeployment in these two areas ought to be politically feasible. It is the sequence concerning the rest of the territories, which is to start once the first phase is out of the way, that will surely create more serious problems. And — we must not forget — the government still commands a tiny and not very stable majority in the Knesset.

The PLO leadership in Tunis has more severe problems. It must, at once, impose its untested clout in the territories. It has to prove to the Israelis, to the outside world and, above all, to the agitated population, that it can handle the inheritance, control civil unrest and at the same time quickly improve the lives of the impatient masses. Success or failure will depend not only on the ability of Chairman Yasser Arafat to administer the two first enclaves of autonomy — a formidable enough task for the leader of an organization with a rich record of terrorism and diplomacy, not of administration — but also on the amount of assistance he gets from the outside world. That, in turn, will be forthcoming only if he can maintain law and order, and if he can earn local support and international confidence.

The infrastructure of the Israeli administration will gradually disappear and a new one must be quickly in place. A convincing program of reconstruction, such as Gaza has never seen before, must create housing for the masses of refugees who live in appalling conditions. The program must also generate income for the work force that will cease to have easy access to the Israeli labor market. All these are not just matters of social justice or charity; but of essential, practical expediency. Only if Gaza becomes a bustling reconstruction site, is there hope that its misery will be gradually eliminated and the area eventually pacified. If not, it will explode. Gaza's Israeli neighbors cannot be indifferent to the developments in that overcrowded and violence-infested territory. What happens in Gaza, once autonomy is in place there, could well determine whether any peace plan for the Middle East can succeed.

When the coordinator of Israel's activities in the territories, General Dani Rotschild, pointed out in a recent interview how essential it was for the international community to massively assist the reconstruction efforts in the territories once Palestinian self-rule is established, the Israeli interviewer was surprised by — as he put it — "the general's good PR job for Arafat" and told him so. The officer replied dryly, that if the PLO administration fails in its effort to prove to the population that it is better than the Israeli administration, there is no chance for the peace to hold.

It is a new experience for the Israeli public to be told by its political and military leaders, who are even now engaged in the bitter repression of Arab terrorism, that the nation's well-being will be so dependent on Arafat's success in imposing control in the territories. To many, this reasoning sounds absurd and hard to swallow. But it is cold logic even if it clashes with the emotions of a large sector of the public and particularly with the aggressive campaign waged by the rightist opposition, which exploits these emotions rather effectively.

But the general's remarks also reflect the process of rethinking that is going on in Israel in spite of the acts of terrorism which are now, after Hebron, more frequent than before. The peace forecast does not look good, but to give peace a chance, it is advisable to keep our fingers crossed if and when Gaza changes hands and, whether one likes it or not, hope that Arafat will succeed there. It is uncertain, whether he is up to the task, if he really wants to go ahead, or simply wants to extract more concessions. But whoever, here or abroad, finds it preposterous or too disgusting to deal with Arafat, he should come forward with a better idea and do so quickly, because time is not on the side of peace. There were, in the past, better options but they were all wasted. Now, so late in the day, there seems to be no alternative, but to keep the present one alive, for it may just work.

Peace settlement is attainable if Syria wants it

By ITZHAK LEVANON

Presidents Bill Clinton and Hafez al-Assad met in mid-January in Geneva. At a joint press conference they implied that new understanding between Israel and Syria could open the road to successful negotiations. Now it seems that these expectations were premature. Evidently, Assad was more interested in impressing North American public opinion that he was in defining the nature of peace with the Israelis.

Recent events cause me to believe that Syria can consolidate a peace in the Middle East if only it wants to. Following the summit, Assad was thrown into grief by his son Basil's death in a car accident. With his death, Syria lost its legitimate and indisputable successor to Assad. During the 40 days of mourning for Basil Assad, Syria deferred its peace efforts. But Jerusalem took this opportunity to send a delegation of Israeli parliamentarians to Damascus to pay a condolence visit to the Syrian president. Assad received this mission and spent two hours with them discussing his perception of peace in the region without clarifying the kind of peace he seeks with Israel.

Foreign Minister al-Sharaa held a press conference during his visit to Bonn this past March on the premises of the Syrian Embassy. Contrary to previous practice, Israeli correspondents who had asked to cover the event were ultimately permitted to enter the building for the press conference. Although these are encouraging signs, nevertheless they are timid overtures and not sufficient to create a climate of confidence necessary to reach tangible results.

Israel signed a Declaration of Principles with the Palestinians as a step along the road to implementing the interim self-government arrangements. Israel has also reached a full verbal, albeit unofficial, understanding with Jordan. At this stage, I believe that the key to a comprehensive and stable peace lies in the direction of Damascus and Jerusalem.

Many might be surprised by Israel's generosity if Syria would publicly back the notion of peace, which includes open borders, full diplomatic relations, reconciliation and total normalization. Syria can contribute to stability in the region by ending the violence perpetrated against Israel by proxies like the Hezbollah in south Lebanon. Damascus should be aware that regarding the territorial aspect, the price paid by Israel for peace with Egypt cannot be set as a condition for achieving peace with Syria. Nevertheless, there are several options which can be discussed seriously. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has left open the possibility of a significant pullback, to be decided by the people in a referendum assuming a viable agreement could be reached. The people, and only the people, will decide.

Syria might benefit from the peace and improve its international stature. It might improve its economic position by generating a process which can lead the whole area down a more prosperous path. Hopefully, in a few weeks, an aggreement with the Palestinians will be finalized. Then all efforts should be focused on the Israel-Syria track. This time I hope that Damascus will be prepared for the kind of relations Jerusalem is offering for a total reconciliation and a full normalization.

Israeli Arabs cope with their national identity

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The split identity of Israel's nearly 900,000 Arab citizens was highlighted again recently, as Israeli Arabs seized the national consciousness by marking Land Day with a general strike.

Despite fears of unrest, however, the protests passed quietly, with the national police chief, Rafi Peled, praising the Arab community for its "maturity and responsibility" as the day drew to a close.

Land Day, held annually on March 30, commemorates violent protests against the confiscation of Arab land in the Galilee in 1976, in which six Arabs were killed.

This year, Land Day was a closely watched harbinger. February's massacre in Hebron had thrown the dual role of Israeli Arabs into the foreground with signs boding both good and bad for the prospects of continued coexistence.

As Palestinians, Israeli Arabs had reacted with an unprecedented wave of unrest when Muslims were killed by a Jewish settler while praying in Hebron.

But as an Israeli, an Arab judge from Nazareth is serving on the commission investigating the massacre, effectively sitting in judgment on the army and playing an unprecedented high-profile role in Israeli democratic life.

"We are dealing with an ultra-complex situation where different currents and contradictory trends all mix together," explained Elie Rekhess, a consultant to the prime minister's office on Arab affairs.

The result is that Israeli Arabs are experiencing both "a growing sense of Israeliness and at the same time a growing sense of belonging to the Arab nation and the Palestinian people," said Rekhess, who is a senior fellow at the Moshe Dayan Center of Tel Aviv University.

Rekhess said these processes have been accelerated by the accord signed last September between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

For Israeli Arabs, the accord recognized the Palestinian national identity. But they also see it as having eliminated the Israeli-Arab conflict long used by Israel as an excuse for avoiding the challenge of providing equality to Israeli Arabs.

The sense of a renewed Palestinian identity was evident in the traumatic bursts of hostility and violence that characterized the Israeli Arabs' reactions to the tragedy in Hebron.

For several days afterward, the scenes on the streets of Arab towns and villages inside Israel were reminiscent of the early days of the intifadah, the grass-roots Palestinian uprising in the territories that began in December 1987.

It seemed as if the Palestinian uprising had finally, and perhaps decisively, crossed the Green Line, the borders of pre-1967 Israel that separates the territories from Israel proper.

The Jews of Israel reeled in collective shock as this incipient mayhem even swept through Jaffa, now a mixed Jewish-Arab section of Tel Aviv.

The shops and restaurants of this bustling, picturesque section have yet to recover from the clashes between Arab youngsters and police that were widely televised during those tension-filled days in late February.

In the Bedouin township of Rahat, in the northern Negev, a young man was killed by police fire — the first Israeli Arab to die in this way in almost 20 years.

But in less than a week, the unrest subsided swiftly and totally, a fact likely linked to the naming of Judge Abdel Rahman Zouabi of the Nazareth District Court to the five-member panel investigating the massacre.

Indeed, that appointment may have been the first major achievement of Chief Justice Meir Shamgar, who heads the commission.

Israel's Arab citizens were profoundly, and positively, affected by the appointment.

It graphically symbolized the difference between the status of Israel's Arab citizens and that of the Palestinians living in the administered territories.

Within the Shamgar Commission, Judge Zouabi has been able to cross verbal swords with the Ehud Barak, chief of staff of the Israel Defence Force.

Zouabi has been the toughest interrogator of IDF witnesses throughout the hearings. And in his questioning of Barak, he made it blatantly clear to the chief of staff, and to the Israelis glued to their television screens, that he did not accept the logic that routinely allowed Israelis to carry their weapons into the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

At around the same time, the long-heralded potential of Israeli Arabs to serve as a bridge between Israel and its neighbors appeared to receive one of its biggest boosts in the first-ever visit by Israeli citizens to Damascus in early March.

The 50-member delegation of Israeli Arabs paid their respects to Syrian President Hafez Assad on the recent death of his son, Basil.

But this bit of history-making also reflected the ambiguous nature of Israeli Arab identity. Knesset member Abdel Wahab Darawshe of the Arab Democratic Party, a leader of the delegation, made statements in Damascus that seemed to identify him more with Palestinian nationalism than with the Israeli polity.

Another signal that the overwhelming sentiment in Arab public opinion is still a strong identification with the Palestinian cause came March 23 in a protest by Arab leaders against Israel's military operation against fugitives in Hebron.

The coordinating committee of Israeli Arab local authorities, under Islamic leader Ibrahim Nimr Hussein, sent a cable to the prime minister protesting the operation.

The cable, in its tenor and tone, was regarded as the most forthright public protest and denunciation of the army by the Israeli Arab leadership in recent memory.

Amid these conflicting signals, observers had feared that Land Day might reveal the quiet to be but the calm before the storm.

Indeed, tensions were primed. The leaders of the Israeli Arab community declared a full-fledged general strike, indicating a higher level of protest than usual.

And they centered their demonstration in the town of Rahat, where mourning was still underway for the Israeli Arab killed by police.

The quiet strike highlighted both facets of the Israeli Arab identity.

Through it, Israeli Arabs expressed their continuing solidarity with the Palestinians under occupation.

But, as Israeli citizens, the strike also afforded an opportunity to vent their grievances over economic and social discrimination, issues perpetually studied by Knesset committees but never fully redressed.

One reason for the calm was that police officials had learned the lessons from the late February violence and resolved to apply less force.

Intensive contacts with Arab leaders before Land Day helped both sides arrive at an understanding by which the Arab leaders promised to do their utmost to maintain calm and quiet, and the Israelis promised to keep police officers off the streets.

"A general strike is a serious event on its own," said Rekhess, "but it all took place within the boundaries of the law."

Hungary's responsibility

Hungary, a nation ravaged by fascism and torn by communism, has yet to come to terms with the terrible legacy of the Holocaust. This was an event that decimated Hungary's Jewish community and exposed the heartlessness and tacit complicity of all too many of its Christian citizens in the face of Nazi and Arrow Cross brutality and butchery.

Despite the enormity of the Hungarian Holocaust, post-war Communist governments in Hungary studiously ignored it, consigning it to the dustbin of history. The result is lamentable. Two generations of Hungarians know practically nothing about this unprecedented catastrophe. Nor are they really aware of the role played by Hungary's Arrow Cross movement in the demonization, ghettoization and murder of Hungarian Jews.

The current right-of-centre Hungarian government, which swept into office after the demise of communism, has tried to rectify the situation, but these efforts have not been entirely felicitous. Last month, Prime Minister Peter Boross issued a statement expressing sorrow at the wanton loss of Jewish life during the Holocaust, and laid a wreath at the Jewish cemetery in Budapest. However, Boross failed to recognize Hungary's national responsibility for events in Hungary prior to and after the 1944 German occupation. Furthermore, Boross and his foreign minister, Geza Jeszensky, insensitively declined an invitation to attend a ceremony, sponsored by the World Jewish Congress, marking the 50th anniversary of the deportation of Hungarian Jews. Finally, Jeszensky stirred rightful indignation when, at a conference on the Holocaust, he equated the deaths of all Hungarians, Jews and Christians, who perished during the war. This flighty comparison raised eyebrows because Arrow Cross murderers, as well as Hungarian soldiers fighting alongside Nazi Germany on the Eastern front, were lumped together with innocent Jewish civilians who were rounded up and deported for no other reason than they were Jewish.

It was left to Hungary's president, Arpad Goncz, to try to make amends for their myopic blunders. Speaking at the World Jewish Congress ceremony Boross and Jeszensky had avoided, Goncz declared that far too many Hungarians had stood by indifferently as "their fellow countrymen" were marched away into oblivion. "It is our duty," he declared, "to look straight (at) the truth."

At a time of rising intolerance and anti-Semitism in Hungary and elsewhere in Europe, and at a time when Miklos Horthy — the Hungarian leader who collaborated with Hitler — is being rehabilitated as a Hungarian patriot, Goncz's thoughtful ruminations bear repeating.

Hungary did not acquit itself honorably, either before or during the Holocaust, and the least Hungarians can do now is to ponder these unassailable facts with courage and honesty.

Symbol of new age

While news reports from Germany are still dominated by stories about neo-Nazi hooligans and the rise of an extreme militant right wing political coalition, here and there one notes developments that signal Germany's more positive profile.

A case in point is the German government's reconstruction of one of the finest examples of synagogue architecture in that country, the famous Oranienburgerstrasse Synagogue, built in 1866.

The synagogue, partly destroyed by Nazi thugs during the infamous Kristallnacht pogrom, was used by the Nazis as a uniform depot. The structure was partially destroyed during Allied bombing raids in 1943. Because it was situated in what later became East Berlin, the site of the Oranienburgerstrasse Synagogue was ignored by the Communist authorities until 1988 when Erich Honecker, the head of the East German state, permitted the Jewish community to build a small Jewish centre there.

Now the authorities in Bonn have continued with the work started by moving to complete the reconstruction of the exterior and parts of the interior. The new building will not be an exact replica, but will house a modern museum of Jewish life. Work on the synagogue is slated to be complete on May 8, 1995, the 50th anniversary of Germany's surrender.

It is unlikely that German Jewry will ever again need this kind of a synagogue. Nonetheless, almost half a century after World War II, it is heartening to see the German government restoring one of German Jewry's most beautiful structures.

TO BE A JEW

I want to share my experience with your readers. I am 27 years old, in the process of an Orthodox conversion. I had explained to my rabbi my deep concern in regards to being accepted and welcomed by the community at large.

This year, since I have made a true commitment to myself and to Hashem, I wanted to feel the true spirit of each and every day, especially the holidays. And what better way than to be with a family?

I have a friend who has been away from his family for the past six years. No matter where he is, be it in Britain, France or Switzerland, the community has always opened its hearts and most of all its homes to him.

My rabbi had informed me that there was no family willing to have me and others for the seders, for some people prefer to be with family only. I felt extremely sad. I thought if anyone would understand what it feels like being an outsider or alone, it would be this wonderful community that I am embracing with all my heart.

For the most part, Jews are there for one another. It is so odd; some of you would give funds and of your time to many causes, which is great, G-d bless you, yet some people forget it is a mitzvah to welcome people into their homes, be it Jew or gentile — anyone in need.

I am very proud to say I have the most loving, supportive family. (My father is Muslim, my mother Roman Catholic.)

Fortunately, the parents of dear friends who were away for the holidays welcomed not only me but two gentlemen into their home for the Passover seder. I truly felt comfortable, for I assisted my friends' mother with the enjoyable tasks that accompany any "family" gathering.

I hope and pray that by sharing my experience with your readers some of you will have learned and remember others who are in need of "family" — and most of all what it means to be a Jew.

ISRAELIS STILL MISSING

Recently I met some members of the families of Israeli soldiers missing in action. They are concerned that in the rush to reach peace agreements, these soldiers will be forgotten. They pleaded with me to reach Canadian Jews with a request that they write the Israeli Embassy or their local consulate to ask for assurances that no peace agreements will be signed until the fate of these soldiers has been determined and any of them who are still alive are returned. I hope you will respond to this appeal.

"YENTISHA BAROQUE"

Arnold Ages' article on Jewish civilization and architecture, while well intended, is badly skewed. To devote a third of the space to Morris Lapidus, whose style at best can be described as "Yentisha Baroque" (admirably suited to the culture of Miami Beach), but to omit any reference to the great architects such as the master Louis Kahn, or James Freed, the designer of the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, is a very superficial recognition of the contribution of architecture to Jewish civilization.

The practitioners named in his random list of modern architects, including some Canadians, were all commercially successful; but with one or two exceptions, their work is not particularly noteworthy. Of greater interest to your readers would have been the inclusion of one of the first Jewish architects to practise in Toronto, the late Abe Sprachman, and his son Mandel, who between them significantly influenced the design of theatres across Canada. In addressing Jewish civilization, Ages' most obvious omission is his disregard of the uniquely indigenous architecture evolving in Israel, designed for the most part by graduates of the Technion.

MACHAL'S CONTRIBUTION

As a member of Machal, North Americans who served in the Israeli War of Independence in 1948, I am very upset that Machal was not recognized, included nor invited to any of the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

The 300 or 400 Canadians that served in the army, navy and air forces made more than a small contribution to the founding of Israel. In fact some of them lost their lives during this conflict.

KUPER IS ALIVE

Having just been handed a clipping of an article in The CJN by your staff writer, Ben Rose, re Al Waxman and A Shayna Maidel, I wish to bring the following to your attention:

Sun In My Eyes was not an adaptation of the book, Child of the Holocaust, but an original play written in the '50s and produced on CBC TV in 1960.

Furthermore, Al Waxman did not portray the author as the article states, but the author's uncle, Moishe.

Lastly, both works deal with how the author survived, and to the best of my knowledge, as of this writing, he is still living. I think.

SISTERS AND STRANGERS

I want to thank Frances Kraft and The CJN for the excellent article on Avi Armoni, director of the New Israel Fund (NIF) in Jerusalem. I'm glad your readers had the opportunity to learn about the kind of activities which the Fund has undertaken in Israel to promote co-existence, tolerance and democracy.

The New Israel Fund has an office in Toronto, 1,500 donors who have supported NIF projects since 1989 and active committees in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. In fact, the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC) itself sponsors several fundraising events. The Sucah by the Water event in the fall supports the Israel Women's Network and emergency programs for Israeli women in distress. And, the NIFC Film Night (part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival) raises money for the Israel Civil Liberties Law Program.

This year, to emphasize our commitment to co-existence, New Israel Fund of Canada is hosting a Meretz Member of Knesset, Naomi Chazan and a Palestinian Israeli and former lecturer at the University of Haifa, Dr. Mariam Mar'i. They will be in Toronto this June as part of a lecture tour called, Sisters and Strangers.

If your readers want more information, please call (416) 340-0507.

Some items that few people know about

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

The two items which I have chosen for this week's column have not (at least not to my knowledge) made it into the general press. One is from Germany, the other from Israel.

The German item may be subtitled "The synagogue that was spared." The locale is a little town in Bavaria that I had never heard about (and I am pretty familiar with German geography). Its name is Veitshoechheim, located not too far from Wuerzburg, where in olden days a famous rabbinical seminary was located.

Rabbi Plaut

It so happened that on November 9/10, 1938, when 1,100 German synagogues and places of prayer were destroyed during Pogrom Night (formerly known as Kristallnacht), the synagogue in Veitshoechheim was spared — but not because the town's population revolted against the idea of destroying a place of worship or because the local Nazis did not carry out their orders. The reason was simply that even before that dreadful night the synagogue had been expropriated and had been turned into a firehouse. Thus, it escaped destruction — but that is not the end of the story.

Recently, during some renovations which were designed to turn the building into a museum, synagogue fixtures and other ritual paraphernalia were discovered in a storage room, which also contained objects from the 18th century, along with historical memorabilia, such as a plaque remembering the Jewish veterans of World War I.

According to the person who has been put in charge of restoration, "there was no defilement through burning, or through unclean use as animal stalls." The city administration has now purchased the building next door which will be the new museum and the old synagogue will be restored to its former use.

The news item does not tell us how many Jews are now living in Veitshoechheim. My guess is that there are few or none.

The out-of-the-way item from Israel which struck my fancy has to do with organizations that are unpopular — not because they are violent or obstruct the normal carrying out of public business, but because they raise legal points designed to procure rights for unpopular groups.

Thus, there is an Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) as well as B'tselem, the Israeli Information Centre for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories.

Most people have little use for such organizations, which they accuse of pampering the enemies of the state by trying to secure rights for Arab detainees or other persons deemed dangerous. People also say that while Jewish Israelis come forward to protect Arabs, Arabs never stand up to protect the rights of Jews.

I am glad to report, therefore, that there is in fact an Arab organization in the territories which is called Al-Haq and may be said to be the leading Palestinian human rights organization. It has recently come out against detaining right-wing activists of the Kach and Kahane Chai movements. (This news was provided by Peter Hirschberg for the Jerusalem Report of April 21.)

Al-Haq is headquartered in Ramallah, and its spokesman Fateh Azzam said that "from Al-Haq's point of view, administrative detention must be rejected regardless of who is involved. It is a violation of civil rights."

There is also a Palestinian Human Rights Information Centre in East Jerusalem, and its director Jan Abu Shukah too has stated that she and her group oppose administrative detention — regardless of what political views the detainees profess.

Most people in Israel pay little attention to groups they consider to be on the fringe of society, even though their conscience may on occasion be pricked by the moral and legal arguments that are brought forward.

Before we turn and go to "more important" subjects, let us remember that right here in Canada, in our own midst, we have an organization of similar nature. Called the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA), it too promotes causes that no one else dares to touch, and is ready to protect persons whom the public has already judged guilty and unworthy of legal protection. In my opinion it is no accident that the CCLA is headed by a distinguished Jew, Alan Borovoy, C.M. [Member of the Order of Canada], whose views have often been either ridiculed or condemned by a lot of people.

But society needs voices like that, in Canada as well as in Israel or anywhere. It may of course be that "the people know best," but they don't always.

I salute those who have made it their task to prick the public conscience and test the law, even when it is less than popular to do so.

Jews are mute in face of Bosnian screams

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

One can't help wonder why the Jewish community invests so much time and so many hours into Holocaust education.

For years, we have attended lecture after lecture given by survivors and experts on Holocaust studies. We've viewed dozens of Schindleresque movies keeping us on the cutting edge of Holocaust issues such as Washington's refusal to blow up the tracks leading to Auschwitz.

When the '80s rolled around, we paid to send our community's teenagers to see Auschwitz, hoping to ensure Jewish continuity and an awareness of evil in our midst.

In the '90s, the Holocaust Memorial in Washington was added to our list of educational tools. Hundreds of our community's members travelled to the U.S. capital and spent a day viewing pieces of the Nazi killing machine and the destruction of European Jewry.

And as we educated ourselves, the thing which pained us the most was how any human being could have gone about their daily chores knowing what barbaric things were happening to our people. "Where was the world," we asked, "when we screamed for help."

The answer was hard to come by but we swore we would "never forget" and always be eternally vigilant of other's suffering.

Then on April 19, we awoke to the headline, Gorazde mayor pleads after 'night of screams'. Over our coffee we read how the mayor of this besieged Bosnian town pleaded with the world to stop the Serbian bombardment.

Sip after sip, we discovered his horror as he listened to the shrieks coming from the town's hospital as "parts of bodies are flying into the air." We read about the ceasefire breaches and the town's people begging to be rescued.

It was there in front of us, at our breakfast table.

And we realize that we've heard something like that before. It's a familiar phrase . . . flying glass . . . broken bodies . . . the night of crystal . . . Kristallnacht . . . Berlin . . . Germany.

God, we know that phrase. It once described us. Our own 'night of screams.' The terrifying cry of our people as they were beaten, murdered and their community broken like a pane of glass falling to the floor.

Yet, on April 19, we were mute. We were paralyzed at the mouth. The screams of the people of Gorazde did not move us, the Jewish people, the way we had demanded of the rest of the world.

Barely a word escaped the pens of our leading writers and journalists, demanding immediate action of our leaders. Not a Jew stood on a politician's porch refusing to let them sleep, until they forced the Canadian people to respond to 'the screams of Gorazde.' Not a rabbi insisted that their synagogue's lights burn all night, if need be, while committees worked to lobby governments, and to organize protests.

And through it all, the daily trips to Washington's Holocaust Memorial continued and the world's apathy enraged us. Our children returned from visiting Auschwitz, and were full of grief at the sight of the bunkers. Theatres burst at the seams holding overflow crowds to see Schindler's List.

One wonders, then, if all the Holocaust lectures, films and missions are not in some way calling us to action, then what are they doing? What do we mean when we keep saying we are eternally vigilant.

Eternally vigilant of what?

Is it enough to learn more and more about the Holocaust and simply say, "I'm angry. I'm not going to do anything about it, but I'm angry." Isn't that like watching your neighbor's house burn under the match of a pyromaniac, and telling them, "Yes, I'm terribly upset your home is burning, but don't expect me to put it out."

If the morning newspaper and its reports on 200,000 dead in Bosnia, and 100,000 massacred in Rwanda do not evoke an active response from us as individuals and as a community, then what of all this Holocaust education?

If our anger at the world's silence during the worst time in the history of the Jewish people does not force us to cry out in pain and rage and remembrance when we see it happening to someone else, Jew or non-Jew, then perhaps we should sit down and talk and maybe think this whole Holocaust education thing through just a little bit more carefully.

Shavuot — a primer for the least understood holiday

By ALLAN GOULD

It's coming again!

Shavuot: The least understood holiday of the Shalosh Regalim (The Three Legs — which must refer to a rotten horse bet on by one of the great rabbis of the Talmud era.)

Every Jew — even the least traditional — is well aware of the most famous of the three major holidays — Pesach, or Passover. That's the holiday when the angels of HaShem "passed over" Jewish women, so they were able to leave Egypt. This interpretation is based on the fact that today, some 3,000 years later, they are unable to leave the kitchen from Purim until well after Pesach.

Allan Gould

And, of course, there's Sukkot — or Booths — when we recall how the ancient Hebrews lived in booths in the desert, because they were still unable to afford larger, suburban dwellings. (When you put down "slave" on your resume, your chances of getting hired, especially by Amalekites or Canaanites, are pretty slim.)

Anyway, Shavuot is rapidly approaching. Now Shavuot, as most readers of this fine periodical know, is the holiday of weeks, since it took weeks for us to change over the dishes from Pesach back to regular, everyday stuff, when the cups, saucers and plates actually match.

But Shavuot lacks the "grabber" image, the profound symbolism of Pesach's bitter herbs (not to mention Uncle Herb, whom you manage to avoid for the rest of the year, but always get stuck with on Passover). Shavuot also lacks the stunning and memorable metaphor of the sukkah, with its beautiful yet temporary walls, its fragile roof and charming icicles hanging from the schach, as well as your younger sister's braids.

No, Shavuot does not have the immediate recognition factor of the other two "legs." And so, to help you out, here is another of this writer's beloved quizzes. (Answers on page 125 in this issue, but no fair peeking!!)

1. What great event in the early history of our people does Shavuot recall?

A. The moment when the first Jew in history bought retail.

B. Moshe's bar mitzvah.

C. Moshe's wedding.

D. The giving of the Torah.

E. The giving away of Moshe's bride.

2. Near what mountain did the Israelites receive the Ten Commandments?

A. Mount Carmel.

B. Mount Sinai.

C. Now why would HaShem choose to give us the Law from the top of a HOSPITAL, of all places??

3. Who brought the tables of the Law to the Israelites?

A. Western Union.

B. Eastern Union.

C. Middle-Eastern Union.

D. Moses.

E. Morris.

4. How long did Moses remain on the mountain before he brought down the Ten Commandments?

A. Until he could get a room.

B. Until he managed to get the number down to five.

C. Forty days and 40 nights.

D. No, that's how long it rained on Noah's Ark.

E. 40 days and 34 nights; Moses had a lousy travel agent.

5. What ancient Jewish hero, according to the rabbinic tradition, actually died on the holiday of Shavuot?

A. Your late, beloved Bubba, Chaya Yiddis.

B. David.

C. Goliath.

D. You call Goliath a Jewish hero? Go back to Hebrew School, do not pass go, do not collect 200 shekels.

6. What is Tikkum Leyel Shevuot?

A. A special service which includes portions of the Torah and Prophets.

B. I was absent that day in Hebrew School; sorry.

C. Is there a time limit to this question??

7. What book is read only on the holiday of Shavuot in synagogue?

A. The Book of Esther.

B. The Book of Shirley.

C. The Book of Eve.

D. The Book of Ruth.

E. The Booker Prize.

8. In what month does Shavuot occur?

A. Sivan.

B. May, if late.

C. April, if early.

D. Can't these Jews do ANYTHING on time??

9. Why is this holiday called Shavuot, or the Feast of Weeks?

A. The Rabbis just couldn't pronounce "Pentecost."

B. If we called it the Feast of Months, we'd never be able to get any work done.

C. Because it occurs seven weeks after Pesach.

D. Because it takes place 11 weeks after Purim.

E. Because Jews are still "weak" from Passover.

10. What other names does Shavuot have?

A. "That Holiday After Pesach."

B. Chag Hakatzir, or the Feast of the Harvest.

C. "The Holiday When We Can Eat Grains and Actually Use the Washroom Again."

D. Chag Ha-Bikkurim, or the Holiday of the First Fruits.

E. Z'Man Matan Tora-taynu, or the Season of the Giving of the Law.

F. "The Holiday Where We Can Eat Inside and Not Freeze Again."

11. What special food is linked to Shavuot?

A. Hamentashen.

B. Latkes.

C. Pate de fois gras.

D. Chicken a la Melech.

E. Blintzes.

F. French Fries.

G. Leftover Matzah Farfel.

And finally, a question which a teenager I know wanted to challenge us all with:

12. "If Ruth was a Moabite, and Boaz married her, then why can't I date girls who aren't Jewish?"

A. Who let that kid in here?

B. Ruth might have been a Moabite, but you sound like an Amalekite for asking a question like that.

C. Because their marriage gave the world the Davidic line, from which the Messiah will come. Who knows where your line would lead, you rotten little thing!

Allan Gould is the author of 19 books. His latest is The Great Big Book of Canadian Humour, which is an uproarious anthology of our finest comic writers, from Stephen Leacock to the Royal Air Farce; Wayne & Shuster to Second City; Atwood to Richler to Ritter to Zolf. So maybe it would be a nice gift for Shavuot, eh??

Nixon valued Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

When Richard Nixon died last month, my thoughts turned to a warm mid-October afternoon in 1973 I will likely never forget.

I was standing near a bookshop on Allenby Street in Tel Aviv when I heard a muffled roar overhead. Looking skyward, I saw a formation of giant C-5A transport planes, and immediately realized that help was on the way.

The United States was finally sending badly-needed military equipment and ammunition to replenish Israel's dwindling supply.

It was the ninth or 10th day of the Yom Kippur War, and though Israel had begun to turn the tide against Egypt and Syria, the situation on the ground was still fairly desperate.

In the face of this crisis, Prime Minister Golda Meir asked the Nixon administration for tens of thousands of tons of weapons and munitions.

The request, formally conveyed by Israel's ambassador in Washington, Simcha Dinitz, was relayed to President Richard Nixon by his Jewish secretary of state, Henry Kissinger.

However, there were seemingly endless delays before the U.S. emergency airlift of arms got under way.

Twenty-one years later, the reasons for Washington's procrastination are quite apparent. The United States delayed the airlift because it feared that a clear-cut Israeli military victory would make it all the harder to find a political solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute and would poison Washington's relations with the Arab world.

In Years of Upheaval, published in 1982, Kissinger alludes to this strategy, while Nixon, in his own memoirs, states candidly that his objective was "a battlefield stalemate." Such an outcome, Nixon reasoned, would push the warring sides into peace talks at the end of hostilities.

As it turned out, he was right. Shortly after the Yom Kippur War, Kissinger launched a bold peace-making initiative which became known as shuttle diplomacy. Within a month of the October 1973 ceasefire, Kissinger made the first of 11 trips to the Middle East, which culminated in three interim accords, or disengagement pacts, involving Israel, Egypt and Syria in the Sinai Peninsula and on the Golan Heights.

The agreements were of crucial importance.

- They enabled Israel and Egypt to move from war to peace, a process that eventually yielded one of the diplomatic coups of the century, the 1979 peace treaty.
- They produced a durable truce between Israel and Syria on the Golan. This arrangement has weathered several crises, including the 1982 war in Lebanon.
- They sowed the seeds of reconciliation between the United States and the chief Arab combatants in the Yom Kippur War. By 1974, Washington had re-established relations with Egypt and Syria. Egypt became a key U.S. ally, although Syria did not.

Apart from these achievements, Nixon will be remembered as the first U.S. president to visit Israel while still in office, the first president to regard the Jewish state as a strategic asset, and the first president to institutionalize foreign aid to Israel.

When Nixon, the 37th president, took office in January 1969, the United States' relationship with the Arab world was frayed. During the 1967 Six Day War, several Arab countries had broken ties with Washington, absolutely convinced that the Johnson administration had tilted toward Israel. In fact, this was only partially true.

Nixon's Middle East policy hinged on his desire to reduce the influence of the Soviet Union, to weaken Arab radicals and encourage Arab moderates and to assure Israel's security.

Though not viscerally pro-Israel, and somewhat anti-Semitic, as the Watergate tapes revealed, Nixon held Israel in high regard. "We are for Israel because Israel... is the only state in the Middle East which is pro-freedom and an effective opponent of Soviet expansionism," he said.

Nixon, Kissinger writes in Years of Upheaval, "believed that Jews formed a powerful cohesive group in American society; that they were predominantly liberal; that they put the interests of Israel above everything else; that their control of the media made them dangerous adversaries; above all, that Israel had to be forced into a peace settlement and could not be permitted to jeopardize our Arab relations."

True to form, Nixon sought to impose a comprehensive Mideast settlement on Israel, a course of action it has always resisted.

Shortly before his inaugural, Nixon dispatched William Scranton, a hand-picked emissary, on a tour of the Middle East. During the course of his trip to Mideast capitals, Scranton declared that U.S. policy should be more "even-handed," a code phrase which could mean only one thing — a tilt away from Israel.

Nixon's first secretary of state, William Rogers, reinforced that disquieting impression by observing that Israel's post-1967 ceasefire lines with its Arab neighbors "should not reflect the weight of conquest."

Richard Nixon in Israel in June 1974.

Although Nixon did not publicly endorse Rogers' position, he instructed him to try to revive Gunnar Jarring's faltering peace mission. During the War of Attrition, which began soon after the Six Day War, Jarring — a senior Swedish diplomat — was chosen by the United Nations to seek an interim settlement between Israel and Egypt.

In May 1971, less than a year after the War of Attrition had wound down thanks to U.S. mediation, Rogers went to the Mideast to ascertain whether the Jarring mission could be resuscitated.

It could not be, but several months later Nixon agreed to sell Israel Phantom and Skyhawk fighter planes over a three-year period. Steven Spiegel, an authority on U.S.-Israel relations, claims that this was the first long-term arms deal signed by Washington and Jerusalem.

Nixon, Kissinger writes, respected Israel's military prowess, and "admired Israeli guts." Israel did not disappoint Nixon. In September 1970, Israel, in league with the United States, compelled Syria to withdraw a tank force from northern Jordan.

When that crisis erupted, Israel's ambassador to Washington was Yitzhak Rabin, with whom Nixon had warm ties. Rabin, the former chief of staff who would succeed the discredited Golda Meir as premier, thought highly of Nixon, and in 1972 he all but endorsed the Republican party during the presidential election campaign. Rabin's faux pas embarrassed Israel and Jews in the United States, but Rabin's remarks reflected the thinking of the Israeli government.

According to Kissinger, Nixon began his second term in 1972 with the firm intention of launching a diplomatic initiative for the Middle East. The Vietnam war still preoccupied Nixon, but he felt that the Middle East should have "a very high priority" in his administration.

As it happened, the United States completely failed to bring Israel and its Arab adversaries, particularly Egypt, closer to peace.

Indeed, Egypt and Syria made preparations for a campaign to wrest the Sinai and Golan from Israel once their leaders, Anwar al-Sadat and Hafez al-Assad, had concluded that only war could break the diplomatic logjam.

Nixon and Kissinger, having expected Israel to beat Egypt and Syria into submission, were genuinely surprised by Israel's military setbacks in the first week of the Yom Kippur War.

But they used the opportunity to wrest political and territorial concessions from Israel, a process that ultimately brought a measure of stability to the Middle East. In exchange, the United States increased, and regularized, aid to Israel.

In his final weeks as president, Nixon travelled to the Middle East to shore up Kissinger's diplomacy. He was well received by his hosts in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Israel, but his triumphant tour did not diminish the desire of the U.S. Congress to impeach Nixon. Facing reality, Nixon stepped down in August 1974, his reputation in tatters.

Nixon, of course, is best known for his startling rapprochement with China and his policy of detente with the Soviet Union.

But lest it be forgotten, Nixon had a profound influence on events in the Middle East, an area that has confounded many.

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The peace process is beset by substantive and procedural difficulties, terrorism and delays. Nevertheless, Israel has begun to reap the dividends of peace.

Sixteen nations, mainly in Africa, have established or re-established diplomatic relations with Israel since Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat signed the Declaration of Principles (DoP) in Washington on Sept. 13. This means that 136 of the 185 member states of the United Nations now have formal ties with Israel. Diplomatically speaking, Israel has never been so blessed.

Within the Middle East, Israel is engaged in a process of creeping normalization with several Arab countries, and is upgrading its links with Egypt, the only Arab nation that enjoys full diplomatic relations with Jerusalem.

The most striking example of Israel's incremental rapprochement with the Arab world occurred last month in Muscat, Oman.

A large Israeli delegation, headed by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, arrived in that Persian Gulf principality to participate in multilateral talks on water resources in the Middle East, a conference attended by 37 countries.

The atmosphere was relaxed, and Oman and Israel reached an agreement to work together on a solar energy project. Praising the DoP as a step in the right direction, Oman's information minister declared: "We must forget the past. Progress is based on the future." Oman's foreign minister, however, made it abundantly clear that diplomatic relations with Israel are dependent on an overall Arab-Israeli peace accord.

Meanwhile, there are rumors that Oman's neighbor, Qatar, plans to sign an agreement with Israel under which Oman's natural gas would be shipped to Europe via an Israeli port.

According to reports, which Israel has not denied, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Energy Minister Moshe Shahal recently held talks in London with a senior Omani official to promulgate a deal.

Peace dividends

Progress has also been reported from Morocco, which is home to the largest Jewish community in the Arab world.

On his way back to Israel from Washington last September after signing the DoP, Rabin and Peres stopped over in Rabat to confer with King Hassan II.

Since then, Israel and Morocco have signed trade, banking, communications and transportation agreements.

Furthermore, Morocco has played host to the president of the Israeli Chambers of Commerce, the chair of Bank Hapoalim and delegations representing B'nai Brith International and the Jewish Heritage Council, which is exploring the possibilities of renovating and preserving Jewish institutions and sites.

Israel and Jordan are also moving from enmity to cooperation.

During a recent trip to Washington, King Hussein spoke of his wish for a "warm peace" and economic ties with Israel. As well, he said he hoped to meet publicly with Rabin soon.

There have been other encouraging developments. Jordan has agreed in principle to a joint economic conference with Israel in Amman later this year. Crown Prince Hassan, who appeared in public with Peres last September after Israel and Jordan signed an agenda for negotiations, has given Israeli journalists interviews. Jordanian officials have met with American Reform rabbis in Amman. And in Washington, Project Nishma, which works for peace in the Middle East, organized a dinner for American Jewish leaders, with the Israeli and Jordanian ambassadors as guests of honor. The event began in the Israeli embassy and ended in the Jordanian embassy.

The pace of change on the Syrian front seems glacial by comparison. But Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad, has characterized peace with Israel as a "strategic choice."

Until quite recently, Egypt and Israel were locked into a "cold peace." Of late, there has been a dramatic thaw. Israel and Egypt have signed cultural and scientific agreements. Plans are afoot to build a direct telephone link between the two countries. And Egyptians who want to visit Israel will no longer have to register with the security forces.

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not really the return to Islam that's the problem; it's the need for change, said an expert on Muslim countries.

David Menashri of Tel Aviv's Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies was speaking on Islamic fundamentalism at a recent membership reception for Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University held at the Inn on the Park hotel.

Muslim countries have faced the same dilemma for the last 200 years, said Menashri. With their ideology at variance with economic reality, "they started asking themselves, 'If we are so good, why is our situation so bad'?"

In countries such as Turkey, Egypt and Iran, Western military technology was imitated in an attempt to improve the lot of Muslim citizens. Local Muslims also tried instituting European-style school systems in the mid-19th century and European-style parliaments in the late 19th century. The most recent solution, says Menashri, stems from the reasoning, "We are weak because we stopped being good Muslims, not because we are Muslims."

Although Islamic fundamentalists "really believe," Menashri noted that their concerns encompass many non-religious issues. "Most of the fundamentalists have on their agenda to struggle against the political system in their own country," he said.

"Islamic Jihad, or holy war, for them, is not propaganda or ideology," Menashri noted. "I think it's time we take them seriously. . .They kill people. They punish people, and they educate people to view self-sacrifice as an ideal."

Menashri, who spent two years in Iran in the 1970s, said a typical Iranian death notice during the Iran-Iraq war would "congratulate the family" for having lost their son in the war.

Notwithstanding, the movement gives hope and comfort to Muslims, Menashri said. "There are several things in the Islamic fundamentalist movement I like very much," he confessed, citing fundamentalist efforts to provide food for the poor and comfort for the sick and needy. "People need this."

The Islamic fundamentalist threat in Israel, as in other countries, symbolizes a need for social, economic, cultural and political change, Menashri said.

Rabbi Soloveitchik lauded as 'a rebbe par excellence'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Rabbi Julius Berman

TORONTO — The towering genius of the late Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik was combined with a very human personality, full of principle, compassion and humor, says a long-time student who was also his legal advisor.

Rabbi Julius Berman talked about "the Rav" as his followers called him at the annual Meyer Gasner Memorial Lecture, sponsored by Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, which hosted the event, Mizrachi of Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress.

Rabbi Berman, an attorney, is past president of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America and current chair of its Kashruth Commission, past chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations and founder and past president of the National Jewish Committee on Law and Public Affairs (COLPA).

The custom of putting up a headstone on a grave at the end of the first year, Rabbi Berman said, came about because "during the first year, we don't need a stone to remind us about the person. After 12 months, time heals the wounds, and that's when we need the stone."

In the case of Rabbi Soloveitchik, Rabbi Berman said in a choked voice, "the wound is still open — the wound is still raw."

Moses described to his father-in-law the requirements of a leader, Rabbi Berman said: someone who provides for the individual needs of the members of the community, who acts as a judge and posek (one who rules on halachic matters) and resolves disputes, and someone who builds a core of students who develop into leaders in their own right, but still remain his students.

Rabbi Soloveitchik was such a leader, Rabbi Berman said. "For a generation in such critical times to have had a leader who combines all those qualities is a zhus beyond compare."

The Rav, he said, was "an intellectual giant, a rebbe par excellence, a great Jewish philosopher."

But what the rabbi chose to talk about, often with a smile, a laugh and obvious affection, was the Rav's human side.

Although he was Chief Rabbi of Boston, and professor of Talmud and later Leib Merkin Distinguished Professor of Talmud and Jewish Philosophy at Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, Rabbi Berman said that he referred to himself as "a teacher, saying that if Hashem can refer to Himself as a teacher, so can I."

He spent a lot of time at the Maimonides School in Boston, the first day school in United States, which he founded. Rabbi Berman related the story of his finding a little boy sitting in the hall as punishment for some classroom infraction.

The boy responded to Rabbi Soloveitchik's offer to take him back in to the class with a woebegone explanation that he would not be able to pass a quiz the teacher gave at the end of every class. The Rav sat down and taught him the parsha being studied.

"Later he told his family, 'I think we passed!' "

He was a consummate teacher, Rabbi Berman said, able to accomodate all levels of student, from the smicha shiur (the class for those nearing completion of their rabbinic training) to an evening shiur, to a Jewish orientation seminar.

He had a firm grasp of the essentials of a situation. When asked if a woman could join COLPA, an organization of Orthodox lawyers, he asked; "Is she a lawyer? Is she Jewish? Is she Orthodox? So what's the question?"

He was a caring, compassionate man, Rabbi Berman said. He insisted that a young man staying with him (in a his later years he had someone stay with him during the time he spent in New York) could not wear white socks on a date; when the young man said he didn't have any others with him, the Rav gave him a pair of his own.

He said that he himself now wore only white socks, because his wife could no longer see well enough to properly sort socks by color, and he didn't want her to feel badly that she could no longer do a task she felt was important.

Rabbi Berman also noted that the Rav had a close personal relationship with the present Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, whom he had known since they were both students in Berlin. Rabbi Soloveitchik visited the rebbe on his 80th birthday, and it was noted that Rabbi Schneerson came personally to greet him, and escorted him to a seat of honor.

BBW/C expands housing for Jewish abused women

TORONTO — Alternative housing for Jewish abused women is being offered by B'nai Brith Women of Canada (BBW/C), in partnership with Jewish Family Services of Baron de Hirsch in Montreal and Alpha House in Winnipeg.

BBW/C and Baron de Hirsch's plans are underway to begin operating Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing (ASTEH) in Montreal early this summer. Modeled after the 6-year-old prototype in Toronto, ASTEH will complement existing services for Jewish abused women in the community.

ASTEH offers Jewish abused women who may have been in a shelter, a place where life decisions can be safely explored. In addition, ASTEH is a viable alternative to a communal shelter and may be used as a safe house in a community distant from one's own.

ASTEH is a two-bedroom, kosher apartment in which clients will use the counselling services of Baron de Hirsch social workers and receive practical support from trained BBW/Canada volunteers. BBW/C is currently seeking furnishings for the apartment, as well as volunteers for the project.

Until recently, Winnipeg had no secure place specifically for Jewish abused women while they explored their options. BBW/C has united with Alpha House, a shelter with eight individual units, to operate a kosher facility for Jewish abused women. At Alpha House clients receive counselling from social work staff on the premises, and support from BBW/C volunteers. As well, BBW/C will be responsible for ensuring that kashrut is observed in the apartment.

Halton Peel lodge joins B'nai Brith

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

BRAMPTON — B'nai Brith Canada's Halton Peel lodge became the newest charter member of B'nai Brith International in a recent celebration held at the Brampton Golf Club.

"We are delighted that in the Halton-Peel region the B'nai Brith banner is unfurled and will join with the synagogues in bringing a presence of Jewish life to this region," said B'nai Brith Canada president Gabriel Nachman.

Mayors Hazel McCallion of Mississauga and Peter Robertson of Brampton welcomed the lodge to their communities, and a candle-lighting ceremony marked the installation of Steven Black as lodge president, Rochelle Guilford as vice-president, and Sharna White as secretary-treasurer by BBC executive vice-president Frank Dimant.

Black was presented with a gavel, a banner and a menorah — gifts from the Hamilton, Maccabiah and Mayvin lodges respectively.

The lodge, which has a heavy focus on multicultural activities, grew out of a meeting of a dozen people in a private home over a year ago. Today there are 32 members, representing an area that encompasses Mississauga, Georgetown, Brampton and even Etobicoke.

There are three synagogues in the Halton-Peel region: Solel in Mississauga, Shaarei Beth-El in Oakville and Har Tikva in Brampton. B'nai Brith's Halton-Peel office is located on Airport Road in Mississauga, where Joyce Aster serves as membership coordinator. Having a local presence is a key element in the lodge's success, believes Pearl Gladman, B'nai Brith's national director field services.

B'nai Brith Canada has 90 lodges, whose members number among the 500,000 members of BB International. The international organization marks its 150th anniversary this year. B'nai Brith activities include community volunteerism, interfaith and intercultural dialogues and combating racism and bigotry.

Reform congregation in planning stages for Durham Region

AJAX, Ont. — Yes, there is Jewish life east of Bathurst Street in Toronto.

To prove it, the Committee for a Reform Jewish Congregation in Durham Region is having its inaugural Friday night Oneg Shabbat service May 13, with a view toward establishing a Reform shul in the sprawling region east of Metro.

The service will begin at 7:30 at the Annandale Golf and Country Club on Bayly Street in Ajax. It will be led by Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

According to committee spokesman Harley Saltzman, there are about 80 Jewish families in Oshawa, 40-50 in Pickering and Ajax and some 20 in Whitby and Bowmanville.

The committee was set up late last year to explore the possibility of establishing a Reform congregation in Durham, which has experienced a mini-boom in its Jewish population over the past decade.

Organizers hope the Oneg Shabbat next Friday will become a regular service. Plans are underway to have a Reform congregation in place by this Rosh Hashanah, Saltzman told The CJN.

Talks are ongoing with the owner of a tract of land in Ajax, who is considering donating a private home for use as a temple, Saltzman said.

Jewish residents of Durham currently make the trek to various Toronto and York Region synagogues, and drive children to Sunday and evening classes, Saltzman said.

The committee is also hoping to have a religious school in place by September. Organizers will hand out school registration cards at the May 13 service to gauge demand for classes, Saltzman added.

In the meantime, the temple will be lay-lead. It's hoped a student rabbi will lead High Holiday services.

For more information, call Harley Saltzman at (905) 683-5646.

'Michael is with a family at the moment'
There's a strong probability that Michael Benjamin is with a family when another one calls.
Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.
For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with a licensed funeral director who is Jewish.
There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.
They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.
Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

Former envoy rejects more peace concessions

Arafat failed on promises: Blum

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Continued compromises with Palestinian leaders is making Israel seem like a pushover in their eyes, said the former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations.

"They think the more they try to push us in the corner, the more they can get concessions," said Yehuda Blum.

Blum was speaking at the annual Negev Dinner, which this year honored lawyer David Freeman. Blum was standing in for current UN ambassador Gad Yaacobi, who was in Israel for family reasons.

Blum said the euphoria among Israelis following the signing of the Declaration of Principles last September has evaporated. He said an Independence Day poll last month showed 58 per cent of the population is dissatisfied, while 41 per cent supports government policy.

The same poll showed 44 per cent would vote for opposition leader Benyamin Netanyahu as prime minister over Itzhak Rabin with 38 per cent.

"By no means are our people against peace," Blum emphasized. "But on what terms? Peace at any price? Obviously not."

Every Israel government has wanted peace, he said, and the present government embarked on the peace process with the best intentions.

But Blum said Arafat didn't deliver on his promise to Rabin that he would cease terrorizing Israeli Jews and rescind the PLO covenant calling for the destruction of Israel.

Now, eight months later, many in Israel believe the PLO is co-operating with Hamas, he said.

But despite all the problems, Israel is the big success story of the 20th century, Blum said. The Jewish population of Israel has grown from 600,000 in 1948 to 4.5 million today. In 1948 there were 600 students at the Hebrew University. Today 10,000 study at seven universities throughout Israel.

Israel's agriculture is the envy of the developed countries — 2 million flowers are exported to Europe every night — and the Israel Defence Force is the strongest military force in the Middle East.

Blum called on Jews everywhere "to share this great adventure with us to ensure the survival, identity and future of Jewish life."

Close to 500 filled the banquet hall of the Four Seasons Hotel for the event, including Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen. A major feature was the presentation of a memorial plaque to Norweigan ambassador Bjorn Kristvik, in tribute to the late foreign minister of Norway, Johan Holst, who helped the peace process. The presentation was made by Alan Posluns, Jewish National Fund (JNF) national president, and Norman Gold, Pacific region president.

Freeman, the Negev Dinner honoree, was introduced by former British Columbia Chief Justice Nathan Nemetz. Freeman, a native Vancouverite, said his ties to the JNF and Zionism runs in the family — his late father Max was a Negev Dinner honoree in 1957.

"I feel strongly about the JNF," Freeman said. "We need the state [of Israel] to represent us in international tribunals to prevent a recurrence of the kind of things that happened to Jews over the ages."

He said the JNF represents the eternal possession of the Jewish people.

Freeman said that despite World War II and the creation of the United Nations the world remains without essential sanctions. There are no sanctions to regulate genocide or prevent another Holocaust. "That is why your protection is to support Israel — not for nostalgia, but to secure your own future. You need the state to represent us in international tribunals to prevent a recurrence of the kind of things that happened to Jews over the ages. Israel offers potential as well as present protection."

He said the JNF represents the eternal possession of the Jewish people. As laid down by its founders, its funds could be used only for the purchase of lands in Palestine and Syria. The principle of eternal possession is based on Leviticus which says: "The land shall not be sold forever, for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with Me. And in all the land of your possession ye shall grant a redemption for the land."

Mr. Justice Bruce Cohen of the B.C. Supreme Court, was master of ceremonies.

Several Jews among recipients of Order of Ontario

Selma Edelstone, Ron Satok, 'Honest Ed' feted

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "As a blind person I'm not afraid to paint, mime or dance," says Toronto artist Ron Satok, one of three persons active in the Jewish community who received the Order of Ontario recently from Lieut. Gov. Henry Jackman at an investiture at Queen's Park. Also honored were Selma Edelstone and Ed Mirvish of Toronto.

Satok, 62, blind for 16 years, was recognized for a lifetime achievement in teaching adults and children with special needs at his studio in Cabbagetown. "There are other languages besides speaking," Satok told The CJN.

Ed Mirvish, the legendary Honest Ed of Bloor Street, was honored for "extraordinary charitable contributions and entreprenurial achievments in business and the entertainment industry." The owner of the Royal Alex and Princess of Wales theatres, Mirvish has an office crowded with awards he has won over the years.

Selma Edelstone was recognized for launching Interlink, a program that brings seniors and children together through words and music. She has also taken the program successfully to Israel and other countries. Interlink involves school children and seniors who rehearse a piece of music separately and come together for a joint concert. In the meantime they are "pen pals" and introduce their families to each other.

Others awarded the Order of Ontario were Dr. Prasanta Kumar Basu of Unionville, for ophthalmic research; Lorna de Blicquy of Dunrobin, for advancing women's rights in aviation; M. Joan Chalmers of Toronto, for supporting culture; and Martin Connell of Toronto, for philanthropy in Canada and the Third World.

Also honored were Nicholas Goldschmidt of Toronto, for achievements in music; Martha Henry of London for theatre; J. Conrad Lavigne of Timmins, for French-language broadcasting in Ontario; Donald C MacDonald, for leading the CCF and NDP parties for 17 years; Phillip Nimmons of Thornhill, a jazz musician; Theodore (Ted) Nolan, an NHL player; University of Western Ontario president George Pedersen; Dr. Nelles Silverthorne of Toronto, for medicine; Elizabeth Thorn of North Bay, for education in Northern Ontario; and Dr. Bryan Walls of Windsor, for increasing public awareness of black history in Ontario.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Close to 900 Vancouver high school students were turned away from the 19th annual Holocaust symposium because of a lack of space.

The two-day symposium, held May 4 and 5 at the University of British Columbia, was put on by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC-P). Co-ordinator Marilyn Berger said more than 1,000 Grade 11 and 12 students did attend.

The symposium is fully endorsed by the Vancouver school board. Particpants are selected by their teachers.

A highlight of the symposium was the film, The Courage to Care, introduced by E. Dunner, a "Schindler" who resides in Vancouver.

Two videos were shown featuring interviews with Franz Suchomel, who had been a commandant at Treblinka. One of the interviews was done by Claude Lantzmann.

Dr. Graham Forst of Capilano College and co-chair of the Vancouver standing committee on the Holocaust welcomed the students and introduced a principal speaker, William Nicholls, the former head of the department of religious studies at the University of British Columbia.

Nicholls, who has written a book on Christian persecution of the Jews, spoke on the topic Why the Jews? 2,000 Years of Persecution.

Dr. Leon Bass, a Buchenwald liberator, spoke of arriving at the camp.

In other CJC-P news, the region is preparing a submission for a British Columbia Human Rights Act review. The review is being conducted by Bill Black, special advisor to Moe Sihota, the minister for Multiculturalism and Human Rights.

Feminist movement said good for Judaism

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The feminist movement has had a positive impact on Judaism, says Arna Poupko.

Unlike Jewish men, women are asking questions. In their anger, they are demanding to be taught Chumash and Gemara.

Poupko, director of the Department of Living Judaism at the Jewish Education Council of Montreal and scholar-in-residence at the seventh National Jewish Education Conference in Winnipeg, was debating the question of gender issues in Judaism with Lisa Kogen, an educator at a Hebrew day school in New York State.

Kogen, whose husband, Rabbi Judah Kogen, was the spiritual leader of Winnipeg's Conservative Rosh Pina Synagogue for three years, started the debate by contrasting the joyous reception a Jewish baby boy receives on entering the world, compared with that given to a baby girl.

Throughout life, she said, she felt criminated against in the Jewish religious context.

"Our traditions with their ritual and learning were devised by men," Kogen said. "With few exceptions, women have been excluded from the process. It is time women truly participated in the process of shaping Jewish history. It is gratifying that women have made great strides in the Jewish community's religious organizations. We won't be fully equal however until we too can read from the sefer Torah."

Poupko felt there was "a certain dishonesty" in the debate. She said we live in a pluralistic society where Orthodox observance is not forced on anyone.

Poupko described her own path to Orthodoxy and learning. "I still have questions," she said, "but I have found many answers in rigorous study in the context of Halacha. For some questions, there are no answers. It becomes a question of faith."

She said Orthodox women have voices and can speak for themselves. "We don't need to be rescued from the system. We are owed respect for our choices.

"This should not be a question of gender," she said. "The voices of women are always heard in Judaism within their context."

Delegates demands

WINNIPEG — Jewish continuity is in danger of becoming a mantra, said British educator Clive Lawton.

Speaking from the floor at the closing plenary of the seventh National Jewish Education Conference Lawton was responding to delegates' demands that the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) and the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) Canada take action on the issues identified at the three-day event.

Freda Steel, co-chair of the program committee (along with Gertie Begleiter) expressed her surprise at how little was done about the resolutions made at the previous conference three years ago. She proposed that the CJC, CZF and CJF form a steering committee and create a national Jewish educational program for recruiting and training Jewish teachers.

Professor Irving Abella, addressing the closing plenary as president of the CJC, also called for action on the serious matter of Jewish continuity. "We should begin now — in Winnipeg," he declared. "Seventy-five years from now, this conference should be seen as a turning point... There could be a synergy in combining the expertise of the CJC, the resources of the CJF and the CZF's Israel programs."

Speaking for the CJF however, Evelyn Katz, the Winnipeg chair of the national planning and priorities committee, disagreed. "I am a process person," she said. "I believe we must address the will of the people, but in a process way rather than shooting from the hip."

Abella also expressed his disappointment that there were no community planners at the conference — "the people who should have been there but weren't," he said — to hear the cries for help from small communities, the youth and campus organizations.

Rather than waiting for cumbersome national organizations to take action to turn the glacier aside, Lawton suggested that action be taken on the ground; every local Jewish organization in the country should tax itself one per cent of its budget and put the money into a continuity project aimed at its own constituency. Six months from now, he said, the conference organizers or a national Jewish body should write a national newsletter listing what every organization has done.

"That would be a powerful statement," he said.

Danes helped, hurt Jews during the war

'Country had a dark side'

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The role of Denmark during World War II was the subject of a sermon during the 14th annual Christian service marking the Holocaust last month.

"During the Holocaust, Denmark passed one moral test and failed another," said Rev. Jens Back Nielsen, pastor of the Toronto Danish Lutheran Church.

"While Denmark was responsible for one of the most significant rescue operations during World War II, it was, at the same time, guilty of making German Jews turn back at the border and of issuing temporary visas only to deport them later," he said at the service held in the Church of St. Andrew's.

In 1943, Danes rallied to rescue 7,000 Jewish countrymen. "[But we must not lead] others to believe that all of our actions were pure and humane."

Sponsored by The Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, the annual memorial service led by Rev. Joan Walters commemorates Yom Hashoah (Holocaust) Remembrance Day. More than 100 people turned out.

A native of Denmark, Rev. Nielsen said that while his country was once guilty of animosity toward Jews, Denmark was also a progressive country. "In 1600, for example, our king invited the Jews to live in our country. In 1814, Denmark was the first country to grant Jews full civic rights and protection. On the other hand, we were also guilty of smashing windows and throwing insults to the Jews, but we never killed anyone in such riots."

By World War II, however, it was clear where Denmark stood in their attitude toward the Jews. The German Foreign Office in Copenhagen was told any anti-Jewish actions would be met with the resignation of the entire Danish government.

"But our country also had a dark side," Rev. Nielsen said. "Throughout history, we formed a respect/hate relationship with Germany and consequently didn't believe that German Jews were entitled to asylum in our country. However, we did protect our own Jews with fierce conviction and determination."

In the autumn of 1943, through an intricate web of counterintelligence, subterfuge and clandestine resistance groups, the Danish population hid their Jewish countrymen, fed them, gave them work and finally helped them escape on a flotilla of boats to Sweden. Fewer than 500 Danish Jews were killed in the war.

But, until recently, this rescue operation remained shrouded in secrecy. "As a post-war child, I learned about Nazism and fascism and about the outbreak of war in '39. We heard very little about these heroic events. This robbed my parent's generation of the pride and honor they deserved," said Rev. Nielsen.

"In the Jewish bible it says, 'Love strangers in your country, because you were once strangers yourself.' This is the philosophy we try to live by," he said.

"In Denmark, we are human beings first, then we are Christians. This is life's order in our country. This our doctrine."

Rescuers motivations probed

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK

TORONTO — At a time when thousands looked away as Jews were led to the concentration camps and crematoriums, others took action and saved their fellow human beings.

What motivated these people was explored during a recent panel discussion sponsored by the Generation to Generation group of children of Holocaust survivors.

Psychologist Dr. Alan Bardikoff said those taught respect, individualism and independence are the most capable of rescue. He said coming to the aid of a classmate taunted in the schoolyard, or speaking up over an injustice, are actions that demonstrate one's code of ethics.

"People who act believe they have some responsibility to their fellow person," Bardikoff said.

Rev. Jens Bach Nielsen, pastor of the Toronto Danish Lutheran Church, said the ability to rescue stems from being able to "see yourself in the other person's predicament — you can assess what needs to be done."

Rev. Nielsen said the Danish people felt guilty for making a treaty with Germany, thus becoming "citizens of a country that had accepted an evil system from another country." That obligation, Rev. Nielsen said, was part of the motivation for the mass rescue of the Danish Jews in 1944.

It was that same system that victimized panelist Rabbi Erwin Schild. Rabbi Schild said the Torah instructs that one has a moral obligation to assist people in trouble. Yet nowhere in the Torah is there a situation like the Holocaust.

"The Holocaust was and is unique and is unprecedented. To be a rescuer under those conditions requires a particular kind of human being that is very rare."

Following the panel discussion, Israeli consul general Dror Ziegerman presented a Righteous Among the Nations medal to Joyce Miedema, who accepted on behalf of herself and her late husband, Rev. Pieter Miedema. The Miedemas hid a number of Jews in and near their home in Holland.

Mrs. Miedema was joined by some of her children and grandchildren. The medal was embossed with the Talmudic phrase, "whosoever saved a single life, saved an entire universe."

Health fair at Betel Centre

TORONTO — The Bernard Betel Centre is holding a health fair Thursday, May 12 on Canada Health Day, featuring exhibits and hands-on activities to help seniors maintain their independence.

Among the speakers will be a representative from the Metro Police Force, Reverend Lindsay King of the Family Life Foundation, and Sue Johansen, a lecturer on sexual topics.

In a statement announcing the fair, the Centre points out that over the next 20 years the number of people 65 and over will increase by almost 50 per cent. Despite the growth in the numbers of seniors, the Centre says the total number of beds in nursing homes and homes for the aged will not increase.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Coronary artery disease is the leading cause of death in women over 50 years of age says a staff cardiologist at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Speaking at a recent meeting of Weizmann Women for Science, Dr. Jewel Gold said that the incidence of coronary artery disease in women is increasing and stressed that women should not ignore symptoms that may be linked to the disease. "The incidence of the disease in women lags behind men by about 10 years which means that it takes 10 years for postmenopausal women to catch up with men but as women get older they do catch up."

Among the risk factors linked to coronary artery disease, Gold cited smoking, hypertension, diabetes and a family history of premature coronary artery disease. "Smoking is definitely associated with the disease, and the incidence is increased by the number of cigarettes smoked in a day. The risk will return to baseline, however, within three or four years after smoking has ceased."

She said that high blood pressure increases the risk of heart disease in both men and women, but whereas before age 50 more men have high blood pressure, after age 50 more women are affected. Women with diabetes have an increased risk than their non-diabetic male counterparts in developing heart disease.

Obesity, said Gold, is something that potentiates other risk factors. "The distribution of body fat may be a better indicator of coronary artery disease than total weight."

As for preventative measures against heart disease, Gold said that women of all ages should try and reduce their risks by doing such things as dieting for weight control and fat redistribution, not smoking and taking part in regular physical activity.

Weizmann Women of Science is honoring Marvelle Koffler at a tribute dinner to be held May 30 at the Sheraton Centre. The dinner will mark the establishment of the International Weizmann Women for Science Research Fund which supports research at the Weizmann Institute and focuses on women's health issues such as cancer, arthritis, heart disease, osteoporosis and reproductive disorders.

Treatment of heart disease sees rapid growth in Canada

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto's top cardiologists got to the heart of the matter at a recent public forum on cardiovascular research and treatment.

The forum, held at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, was hosted by the Toronto New Leadership Division of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, which is raising funds for the new Jesselson Comprehensive Heart Institute in Jerusalem, slated to open this spring.

Dr. Bernard Goldman, head of cardiovascular surgery at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, moderated the discussion. About 300 people attended.

Goldman said nearly four million Canadians have some form of heart disease, which is the leading cause of death and disability in North America.

But Dr. Brian Gilbert, chief of cardiology at Mount Sinai Hospital, said no two heart conditions are identical. "Some people experience acute heart pains, the most obvious indication. Even headaches and nausea can be symptomatic of heart trouble," he said.

Treating heart disease is something Dr. Michael Sole knows about. Sole is director of the Toronto Hospital's new Cardiac Centre.

"We have made tremendous progress in the early detection and treatment of heart disease over the last 40 years," he said. "Canada leads the world in advancements made to enhance improvement rates for cardiac patients."

Sole predicted that by the year 2000, scientists will have identified the genetic code for heart disease.

Sole also said doctors in Canada, the United States and Israel are coming close to regenerating damaged human tissues like clogged or blocked coronary arteries, the heart's vital blood pipelines, through injections of genetically engineered material.

The same can be done following a heart attack, according to Sole. Weak heart muscles can be revitalized with the injections, which would eliminate the need for costly and very risky surgery. The techniques have been tested on laboratory animals with positive results.

Physicians may argue over various treatments, but the doctors at this forum were in accord on one thing. There is no better way to take care of your heart than preventive measures. Proper diet, frequent exercise at your personal level of comfort, regular medical checkups and, of course, no cigarettes (either first- or second-hand smoke), remain the best prescriptions for continued good health.

The 70,000 sq. ft. Jesselson Comprehensive Heart Institute will contain eight state-of-the-art operating rooms, and two levels of post-surgical intensive care.

The 200 members of the Toronto new leadership committee of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation are seeking to raise $35,000 for the institute.

The organization's fourth annual fundraising golf tournament will be held June 23 at the Kleinburg Golf and Country Club.

Kahane Chai, Kach leaders plan new party to overthrow Rabin

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The leaders of the Kahane Chai and Kach movements have patched up their differences and are forming a third party to advocate the overthrow of the Rabin government in Israel, says one Kahane Chai leader.

Mike Guzofsky, coordinator of Kahane Chai in North America, showed up in Toronto last Thursday night to fill in for Herbert Sunshine, once press secretary to the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, who missed his connecting flight from Cincinnati.

His appearance in Toronto was sponsored by the Jewish Defence League.

The 19-member crowd thinned even further after the change in speaker was announced. Only a dozen people stayed to welcome Guzofsky, who was an hour late, to the Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue.

In his 30-minute speech Guzofsky confirmed the reconciliation between the Kahane Chai and Kach groups, which split after Rabbi Kahane was assassinated in New York City in November 1990. He said the move took place in an Israeli jail, where Kahane Chai leader Benyamin Ze'ev Kahane and Kach leader Baruch Marcel are detained for their involvement with the groups, now outlawed as terrorist organizations by the Israeli government.

The two groups are forming the Committee for Referendum to oust the Rabin government "with a campaign of civil disobedience," Guzofsky said. Part of the campaign will involve wearing buttons with the Kach logo of a clenched fist inside the Star of David. The logo is banned in Israel.

"No one is going to break us," Guzofsky told his audience. "Someday we will be anointed as the leaders of Israel."

Racquetball champ gets medal

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Long time Canadian racquetball champion Sherman Greenfeld won his first gold medal in international competition last month in Buenos Aires and, in the process, evened the score with two top American players he lost to last year.

Greenfeld, the Canadian men's racquetball champion for the sixth year in a row, led a Canadian team of five male and five female racquetball players entered in a qualifying tournament for the Pan American games next February and March, 1995, in Buenos Aires. It is the first time racquetball will be included in Pan-Am competition.

He is training three hours a day gearing up for the Pan-Am Games. "That is one of my goals right now," he said.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

A legend in his own time, Toronto-based hotelier Isadore Sharp, CEO and moving force behind the international Four Seasons-Regent chain of about 45 luxury hotels, announced last month that he has started the process that will lead to his full retirement in three to five years. His plan is to release his controlling interest in the company in installments to an as-yet unknown investor-successor whom the management consultancy firm Goldman Sachs has been retained to find.

"I'm doing this out of a personal need, not a company need," the dapper, 62-year-old magnate said recently during an interview in his Toronto office. "I could wait and do nothing, and something could happen and there could be a change of control overnight. By doing it slowly and selling in stages, I hope to ensure stability."

Voted CEO of the Year by the Financial Post Magazine in 1992 and appointed an Officer of Canada in 1993, Sharp has provided a continuous shaping vision for what has become the largest luxury hotel chain in the world. The empire whose implausible beginning was an astonishingly ordinary Jarvis Street motel three decades ago now includes some very famous and elegant establishments indeed.

They include Four Seasons hotels in Toronto, Chicago, Boston, Hawaii, Santa Barbara, Dallas and Washington, the Ritz-Carlton in Chicago, and Regent properties in Sydney, Fiji and Hong Kong — all 11 of which were among Top 100 Hotels identified by the influential Conde Nast Traveler magazine last October. Its list of top 25 U.S. hotels included seven from the Four Seasons-Regent family, including the Regent Beverly Wilshire and New York's Hotel Pierre.

Sharp's management style is often credited with the success of his hotels. "You have to start treating employees as you want them to treat the customer," he says. "All of our corporate management policy is based on the golden rule: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. In most instances, it doesn't take a lot of deep thinking to know how you're expected to behave. Just put yourself in the other person's shoes."

Although luxury for its own sake is not widely pursued in the pared-down 1990s, Sharp's success rests on the observation that business travellers, who fill most of the rooms in his hotels, will gladly spend a few dollars more for a hotel environment that increases their efficiency, saves time, and is supportive of their mission.

All year long, anonymous inspectors travel from hotel to hotel, measuring each establishment's performance against a massive checklist. How many times does the front-desk phone ring before being answered? Does the bellman describe all the right features of the hotel while escorting guests to their rooms? Does the room-service waiter pour the coffee?

"They go through every department of the hotel in about a week, then meet with management," says Sharp. "It's not a fault-finding mission but rather a fact-finding mission. Everyone who is being scrutinized welcomes this as a means to improve their service."

With Four Seasons's acquisition of the highly reputable Regent chain in mid-1992 — Maclean's magazine called it "the hotel deal of the century" — the company attained a solid foothold in the Asian market, which Sharp sees as crucial in the coming century. "Asia is going to be such a dominant part of the world economy that you have to have inroads there," says the inveterate traveller, who spends about half his time visiting his company's properties around the globe.

No matter where they live or what their politics, people universally respond well when trust is placed in them and when treated with dignity and respect, Sharp contends. In Poland and other post-communist regimes, where some Western hoteliers find a tough challenge in teaching front-desk employees to smile, Sharp sees the implicit human element. "They know how to smile," he says. "You've got to create an environment in which they want to smile, in which they want to create good will."

That, seemingly, is what Sharp has been doing throughout much of his distinguished career. In an industry known for its glitz and glamor, he seems refreshingly down to earth, a mensch.

BBYO program links parents and teenagers

Deals with issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Television sitcoms such as All in the Family and Family Ties are being used as springboards for parent-teen discussion in an innovative B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) program just launched in Toronto.

The Parent Teen Dialogue Program, which is a joint project of B'nai Brith's Washington-based Centre for Jewish Family Life and BBYO, deals with issues such as honesty and dishonesty, and drinking. Each topic is dealt with in two or three two-hour-long sessions, and as a rule, two topics are covered in a year. The program is already under way in at least nine American cities.

Although each session follows a structured format, with trained facilitators guiding the discussion, the atmosphere is informal. Ofra Fisher, program originator and director of B'nai Brith's Centre for Family Life in Washington, D.C., insists on holding the program in participants' homes, because that is where she feels dialogue should take place, she told The CJN.

Fisher was in Toronto recently to train Jewish family life educators from Jewish Family & Child Service as facilitators and again to attend the first Toronto session.

The dialogue at that session, run by facilitators Ferne Kappy and Anne Jacob, dealt with stereotyping and anti-Semitism. An episode of All in the Family in which the bigoted Archie Bunker comes face to face with black Jewish entertainer Sammy Davis Jr. served as the trigger for discussion.

"By laughing at someone else, we look deeply into ourselves," said Fisher. "It's much easier to start with Archie than with [oneself]." (Fisher has obtained permission to use the television shows in parent-teen discussion groups throughout North America, she said.)

Following a brief discussion about their reactions to the show, participants broke into two groups — one made up of teens, the other of adults — before reuniting for an intergenerational discussion on issues that had arisen in their respective groups.

Fisher explained the reason for the separate groups: people feel more comfortable with their peer group, especially in a new situation, she said, adding that when they summarize their reactions for the intergenerational group, they know they have the support of their peers.

"But the hope is," said Fisher with a smile, "that what will happen is what happened here [at the first Toronto session]." What happened here, and what has happened in all ten cities — albeit not always at the first session — is that participants request mixed-generation groups instead of segregated ones. Participants may choose not to be in the same group as their parent or child. "We have to respect their [rate of] progress," Fisher said.

"I'm very excited about the program. I have a sense of contribution to the future," said Fisher. In addition to promoting communication between parents and their teenage children, the program includes traditional Jewish commentaries on the subjects being discussed, which Fisher hopes will instill a sense of Jewish pride in the participants.

"The teen years are the most formative years of life," she says. "Both [parents and children] want to talk to each other, and even more, [they] want to listen to each other, but some don't have the tools to do it."

Fisher tells the story of a father in an American city who attended a session "only to prove that it [wasn't a good idea]." She says she received a short note from him a few weeks later in which he thanked her "for finding my daughter for me."

David Traub-Werner, 19, who has been involved with BBYO for seven years, notes that a lot of teens he knows who are heavily into drugs or drinking "have really terrible relationships with their parents." He feels that the program should be used in all BBYO regions. "BBYO can help in a big way," he says.

Toronto, with 300 members, is the largest city in the Lake Ontario region. The region also serves Hamilton, Kingston, Ottawa, London, Buffalo, N.Y. and Rochester, N.Y.

"I think the program would have an incredible impact on smaller communities," says regional director Miriam Pilc-Levine, who coordinated the program in Toronto and initiated it with three BBYO chapters. She hopes to expand the program next year.

Lesley Greenberg, a Grade 12 student, and her mother Tolsa, found the program interesting and enjoyable. Both were surprised to find that the two generations shared some reactions. "Isn't that amazing!" Tolsa said.

Regal Kosher Caterers, a frontrunner in avant-garde and traditional glatt kosher catering, is now under the exclusive direction of partners Joe Elmaleh, Mendy Goldman and Rabbi A.J. Eisenberger, as are King Solomon's Table and The Wok 'N Deli Glatt Kosher Restaurants.

Joanne Katz has also come aboard as the new Catering Manager. Joanne is well-known in kosher catering circles, having served the community in that capacity for 12 years.

Since arriving at Regal in March '94, Joanne has been busy booking weddings, bar/bat mitzvah parties and other special occasions and reports that Regal is now heavily booked for the coming months. The company's attention to detail has paid off with a long list of satisfied customers and countless referrals.

A simcha destination of choice

Regal's relationship with the Montecassino Place Hotel (where their offices and permanent kosher kitchen are located) has been fruitful. The elegant hotel offers fabulous ballrooms for simchas and comfortable suites for guests, with attractive group rates and weekend discount packages. (Room rates start at $69).

Since the opening of King Solomon's Table in February '94, a full-service glatt kosher restaurant on the same premises, the site has become a "hot spot" of glatt kosher dining activity. King Solomon's is available for business lunches and private parties, and can be sectioned off as needed for this purpose.

New chefs, expanded menu

New chefs hired by Regal to serve both the catering division and King Solomon's Table (and alluded to in a recent CJN ad titled "Who's Been Stealing the Great Chefs of Europe?") have more than lived up to their advance billing by serving up one winner after another, to the delight of patrons. Both individuals have a wealth of experience in some of the world's foremost dining establishments, and it shows. Try one of their creations from the newly expanded menu and see for yourself. The Penne Al Salto (fresh pasta tossed with olive oil, garlic, fresh tomato, basil and rappini) is a light and lively burst of Italian sunshine. The Chicken Sorentina (scallopine of chicken breast topped with eggplant, tomato and oregano) shows that there's a new and exciting way to serve chicken. And the Veal Marango (stewed veal with mushrooms, demiglace, tomatoes and herbs served with steamed rice and vegetables) will make you a veal lover if you aren't already one.

Also new on the menu (but not actually on the menu) are daily fresh fish, meat and pasta specials from $9.95. You'll enjoy their novelty and variety as much as the new "superstars" of the kitchen enjoy bringing them to your table.

All-you-can-eat lunch buffet only $6.95

At only $13.95, the all-you-can-eat Chinese buffet is a daily dinner favourite of King Solomon's clients. A reduced version of the buffet (fewer items, but still all you can eat) is served at lunchtime for only $6.95. That's right - an all-you-can-eat glatt kosher lunch buffet for only $6.95! (The prices reflect an ongoing commitment by management to keep high quality kosher cuisine affordable for everyone).

The Wok 'N Deli at Clark and Hilda in Thornhill continues to enjoy a strong following at lunch and dinner. Lineups at dinner allow you to whet your appetite while renewing acquaintances with old friends. (How's that for euphemizing excess popularity?) Actually, the lineups are very brief and the service is friendly and efficient. Obviously, the city's most delicious dilemma (Do you Wok, or Do you Deli?) continues to intrigue the clientele. (A third option, take-out, is a popular alternative, especially these days with the Leafs and the Blue Jays holding court almost nightly). One way or the other, the innovative continental and Chinese menu is sure to win you over.

Eisenberger, Elmaleh and Goldman are unanimous in expressing their gratitude to the community for its ongoing support of all three establishments. Joanne Katz says working with her clients is a "privilege and a pleasure", and invites them to contact her in her new capacity. She can be reached at (416) 630-0303.

Isaac's Bakery: Pain de la vie

Isaac's Bakery, long known for its fine baked confections, has a new specialty — healthy, low fat, low sugar breads and bagels.

In times gone by, it was considered a crime to waste any part of the wheat, and people recognized the wholesomeness of fibre and whole grain.

For over 20 years, however, people have demanded only white, rye or challah breads. Bakers added sweeteners and fat to our white breads to cater to our fondness for things that are sweet and soft.

As well, to increase productivity, natural souring agents were replaced by chemical agents.

Our "easy" generation did not find the idea of eating sugar, egg and fat-free, 100 percent stone grain breads at all appealing. Only health food stores stocked the nutritious wheat, fibre and wheat germ.

Almost overnight, that has all changed. Experts now say that the leading cause of overweight is the lack of fibre in our diet and excessive use of eggs, sugar and fats. Alternative and preventative medicine tells us to eat whole grain and fibre rich foods.

Isaac's Bakery has responded to the newly health conscious public by introducing many varieties of health breads, bagels and muffins and there's more to come.

Some examples are sweet'n sour rye, no-yeast, 12-grain, oatmeal, meusli, linseed and corn breads and such exotic — and delicious bagel varieties as forgacchia spice, 12-grain, corn, and herbs.

Now health and good taste once more go hand in hand.

Isaac's Bakery, which is under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, is located at 3390 Bathurst St., between Lawrence and Wilson (789-7587), and at the Bathurst Manor plaza (630-1678).

Humpty Dumpty fills kosher snack food gap

Kosher snack lovers will be pleased to note that most Humpty Dumpty chips and pretzels are kosher.

The company koshered its three plants in Brampton, Ontario; Hartland, New Brunswick; and Montreal, Quebec over 2 years ago and by now most bags have a kosher symbol on them, reports brand manager Catherine Beauchemin.

She says that the company is now in the process of working with rabbis to study the possibility of its other products becoming kosher as well.

"Especially in markets such as Toronto and Montreal, there is a big demand for kosher products and Humpty Dumpty wants to keep up with those demands. Since our products have become kosher, more stores are carrying our snacks and sales have definitely increased."

Made from pure vegetable oil, Humpty Dumpty snacks are low in cholesterol and high in good taste. "We're always looking for new products because the company's goal is to offer the perfect crunch every time!" says Beauchemin.

Ely's Fine Foods is aptly named

A quick walk through Ely's Fine Foods is like a "Magical Mystery Tour" of culinary delights.

Ely insists there's no mystery, however. Just start with recipes and flavours from Europe and the Mediterranean (all natural, none artificial); use only the highest quality ingredients, like pure cholesterol-free canola oil, pure almonds, hazelnuts and Belgian chocolate; use only real liqueurs like Cointreau and amaretto in the baking; and no meat expanders. Be fanatical about freshness (like baking your baguettes fresh hourly, not daily, and bringing food hot from the kitchen several times daily, especially at suppertime).

First, there are the prepared main dishes of chicken, beef, and fish, elegantly presented and exquisitely seasoned – a fitting cornerstone for any shabbos meal. (If the kids want chicken wings, Ely has them – BBQ, honey garlic or plain).

Next you'll want some salad, and here there's an embarrassment of riches. From carrot spinach salad to eggplant & pepper salad, from Israeli salad to cucumber salad, from imitation shrimp & pasta salad to turkish salad, hoummos and tehina, Ely has everything for the health-conscious and the gourmet. If you just want colesalw, potato salad or macaroni salad, Ely has them too, along with a host of other everyday items.

You'll want bread with your meal, and here's where Ely's really shines, both taste-wise and price-wise. How about an extra-large chala or a dozen Montreal bagels for $1.49? You simply can't buy them for less – even in a non-kosher bakery. And they're delicious. The pièce de résistance is the fat-free French baguettes baked continuously around the clock, which Ely promises will be the most delicious and light-tasting you've ever had.

Ely's carries Central Smoked Fish products at guaranteed lowest prices, and cold cuts from Glatt's, Continental and Levitt's, each with their own special taste. (Weekly cold cut specials are featured).

There's also corned beef, pastrami, paprikash, smoked veal, or "Perla's own" pastellitos (the Moroccan version of a meat knish).

Are we finally ready for dessert? Ely's has cakes from Le Petit Théatre in Montreal, whose glatt kosher creations are internationally acclaimed. For example, the "Perigord" has a chocolate cookie-crumb base infused with almond musseline and a chocolate mousse filling with pralines and almond crunch. We won't even tell you about the "Ganache Cointreau" or the "Miroir Passion." They both should be outlawed, as should the fruit pies, the boston pies, the "mille feuilles" (custard slices), and the mocha cakes.

If a more simple dessert is in order, try the lemon-and-raspberry twist buns, cinnamon buns, or a myriad of other traditional baked goods. Muffins (only 49¢) and cookies are baked fresh daily in variety and abundance.

If you just don't have time to shop for the meal and prepare it, Ely has put together a fabulous "Shabbos value pack" for four.

Ely says "Good Morning!" with a coffee and croissant for only 99¢, and offers a number of terrific soup-and-sandwich and other lunch specials for only $4.99.

Catering is a specialty; Perla's family has 24 years of experience in glatt kosher catering in Montreal, and she will bring that knowledge to your simcha table. Weddings, bar mitzvahs and other affairs are expertly catered at reasonable prices. In-home needs and shiva catering are also handled with attention and care.

Chai Poultry upgrades processing facilities

Energetic, looking to the future – this is an apt description of Chai Kosher Poultry, the only plant of its kind in Ontario.

Its 7-year-old, modern, federally inspected plant provides over 6,000 birds a day to the kosher market across Canada.

Packaged and loose, the company ships chickens, turkeys, cornish hens and stewing hens. Its staff of 53, includes four shochtim (slaughterers) and three mashgichim (kashruth supervisors).

Poultry prepared under Lubavitch auspices also comes from Chai Poultry.

The company, is the only Jewish family-owned and operated chicken poultry processor in Ontario.

Ontario raised poultry

Healthy low-fat foods

Chai is proud to offer turkey in new packaging to give different ideas for healthier cooking.

Turkey scallopini, kebabs, steaks and steakettes are available on completely biodegradable styrofoam trays.

It processes and delivers daily (even up to three times a day when called for) to neighborhood sites and chain stores, including Perl's Meats, Miracle Food Mart, Food City, Sunnybrook, Loblaws, Highland Farms and Loeb's.

The company has recently undergone major renovations to upgrade and modernize its processing facilities, so as to ensure quality and prompt service.

In this day and age, with health conscious consumers turning more and more to healthy, low-fat food, it is comforting to know that those who keep kosher can also get high quality, conveniently packaged poultry, prepared under the highest standards of kashrut and cleanliness.

A new look in town

Customers of TriElm Catering, headquartered at the Borochov Cultural Centre, will have more to be excited about than ever, when the newly renovated hall officially reopens next month.

Part of a complete renovation of the entire building, the peach, white and turquoise hall, with new carpets, mirrored walls, and step ceiling lighting, will be an elegant and attractive backdrop for your bar or bat mitzvah, wedding, or any social or business event.

"We can accommodate functions ranging from 10 up to 300 people," owner Joe Elmaleh says. "We even have a skylight for chuppahs."

Executive chef, Arkadi Zimberg, works with the clients to provide a variety of sumptuous, delicious meals, from traditional to Chinese, to Israeli to Mexican.

TriElm garnishers dress up sweet tables with fruit and ice sculptures. "Its an added finishing touch of elegance to a function," Elmaleh notes.

They also cater at other halls, including the B'nai Brith building in North York and the Paradise Banquet Hall, or in your own home or office.

"We work with Hart Entertainment, who will organize your simcha, and arrange special touches, like basketball machines for a bar mitzvah or a tent for your backyard, so you can have a beautiful affair that's personalized."

A consultant will help you with planning, invitations, decorations, even ordering wine or liquor as a complimentary service.

Shaatness, fashion and comfort in the same garment: it's Divine!

Judit Adam didn't set out to specialize in shaatness, but to create a line of clothing that was both exciting and "respectful to women".

When her easy-wearing, easy-care knits hit the Toronto market ten years ago, the response was instant and emphatic. Women loved the ability to mix and match skirts, slacks, tops, and sweaters that would carry elegantly not only from season to season, but also from day to evening, from home to office, and everywhere in between. The opportunity to create an entire wardrobe from a few pieces of impeccable quality and styling was – and is – irresistible.

Inundated with shaatness requests from day one, Judit decided to make the entire line conform to shaatness requirements. Since the line was already primarily 100% cotton, the transition was easy; today, every garment that Divine produces and sells at its Divine One stores is 100% cotton. No other fibres are allowed in the plant, ensuring that your shaatness needs are 100% met. That means no other fibres in the shoulder pads, thread, buttons or other fastenings.

If you haven't shopped at Divine One, you may think of it as a casual wear store; if you have, you'll know that you can also find an elegant outfit for shul or any other occasion. For example, there's a striking black cropped cardigan with white trim that goes beautifully with a black or white skirt. Full-length dresses and long skirts in every conceivable texture (a long cable skirt is particularly eye-catching, as is a soft, flowing front-pleated pant) will have you looking good and feeling good. Comfort, quality and style are the priorities; Divine knits are always flattering, and particularly forgiving during pregnancy.

As a designer, Ms. Adam feels it's "my job to give clients a wide range of choices and let them decide what's appropriate for their lifestyle and body shape. I'm not here to dictate my fashion taste. My clients have to be comfortable both with what they choose, and in what they choose. If they don't feel good, how can they look good?"

To that end, Adam offers some 40 styles of dresses, skirts, pants, sweaters, vests, tops, and leggings in sizes A, B and C. Colours include oatmeal, peach, silver, khaki, watermelon, green, and turquoise as well as the traditional black, white, brown, natural, and rust. Skirts are available pleated and unpleated, flared and straight, many in three lengths: long, above the knee and below the knee. Waist elastics are easily accessible through a hidden opening. Vests, sweaters and dresses often feature elegant matching covered buttons. Dresses and tops come in a variety of necklines including V-neck, turtleneck, and tiered, with sleeves full-length or cropped.

All garments are impeccably finished inside and out. Prices range from $40 for a camisole to $200-$300 for a two-piece suit: eminently reasonable when you consider the versatility of these garments and the ease with which they mix and match. Two pieces suddenly become four which become eight, and so on. And the clothes are made to last – almost too long.

"Customers come in raving about outfits they bought eight years ago," says Adam somewhat ruefully. "An accountant friend of mine once asked me, "Do you understand the meaning of turnover?"

With ten years of retail success (3 locations in Toronto and stores in Burlington, London, West Bloomfield (Michigan), and Williamsville (New York)), it's obvious that Ms. Adam's creations are turning over quickly enough to satisfy the fashion appetites of many style- and quality-conscious women. Shaatness, fashion and comfort in the same garment is truly a "Divine" combination.

They offer a variety of cuisines, including Oriental, Middle Eastern, Moroccan, Israeli, East European and French, and are happy to work with the customer to create the perfect menu.

Right now, Rachel's Catering has a special offer: a full meal, including bar service (mixes, soft drinks, nuts, chips, and pretzels — everything but the alcohol), appetizer, salad, entree and sweet table for only $49.95, exclusive of taxes.

This is not a set meal. The menu can be customized. You might, for instance, have pasta primavera as an appetizer, a salad with two choices of dressing, roast chicken with side dishes, and a spectacular sweet table.

Rachel's Catering staff is prepared to advise customers on what choices would go well with other foods, so that the menu will be complementary.

This special offer is not restricted to weddings, but is available for bar or bat mitzvahs or regular catering as well.

Rachel's also does private parties. They are noted for their elegant, appetizing and efficiently arranged office parties.

Flexible as to location, they will make sure that everything is in place for your affair or event, and will do everything they can to take the load off the client's mind. The client, they say, (and they mean it) is number 1.

Rachel's works in conjunction with Pride of Israel Congregation at 59 Lissom Cres., whose facilities are available for affairs of different sizes.

Updated tableware

Rachel and Joe are continuing to offer something really special. After every 25 couples have had their weddings at the Pride of Israel synagogue, they are invited to participate in a draw. One of the couples will get a refund of the cost of their wedding, excluding taxes, up to $10,000.

Rachel's never rests on its laurels. They have recently updated their china and cutlery services to the kind of tableware you would be proud to use for your guests.

Rachel's is glatt kosher, under the supervision of the Kashruth Council.

Like other nests, The Chicken Nest is warm and "feels like home". But nobody flies away from this nest; instead, they stay to enjoy the good old-fashioned chicken and ribs that are the "Nest's" trademarks.

"It's not fancy food," says Shalom Magazzinich, who operates the glatt kosher restaurant with his wife Linda. "It's simple, down-to-earth food at down-to-earth prices."

Since opening in November '93, the Chicken Nest has attracted droves of chicken lovers. Soon it will be the only "Nest" in town with a patio, allowing you to watch the Bathurst-Lawrence goings-on and enjoy the sunshine while you eat. (If you prefer to stay inside, the interior is warm and inviting, as befits a nest).

The Chicken Nest also serves a variety of deli sandwiches, middle eastern salads and tempting desserts. Shalom and Linda will be happy to fill your party catering orders.

Customized menus at Malmar

To all those people who miss the delectable foods of Tastefully Yours — rest assured that Tom and Deanna Schaffer of Malmar Caterering are still going strong, offering the same imaginative cuisine and excellent service you've come to expect from them.

While catering to Beth Sholom Synagogue, the Schaffers still specialize in in-house and corporate catering, as well as simchas.

They are glad to advise clients on the variety of different foods available. Each menu is customized to reflect the taste of the client, and uses only the best and freshest of ingredients.

Malmar can supply everything: staff, food, tableware, even rentals such as chairs, tables or if needed, a tent for outdoor functions.

"You will be proud to give your guests the food we have prepared, because of quality, freshness and presentation," Deanna Schaffer promises.

For those with special health needs, such as low-fat, low salt, dietetic or vegetarian diets, Malmar will make foods in quantity to be frozen until needed.

Some people use this service to stock the freezers of their elderly parents or children away at university, who find it difficult to prepare nutritious healthy and appetizing meals for themselves, Deanna Schaffer explains.

Top choices at Dairy Treats

Wholesome, hearty breads, delectable pastries and mouth-watering restaurant fare all in the same place. What more could anyone ask for?

Dairy Treats offers all these different choices, all delicious, all strictly kosher under the supervision of the Kashruth Council.

High fibre whole wheat, stone ground and multigrain breads, and San Francisco sour dough and rye breads have no fat, sugar or eggs — but lots of taste.

Choose from such varieties of bagels as sesame, poppyseed, pumpernickel or corn, not to mention 15 varieties of rolls.

Dairy Treats now also offers scrumptious European-style cakes, like chocolate truffle cake, raspberry mousse bombe, and chocolate daquoises.

This is the place to come for your Shavuos treats, as owner Shlomo Esses is planning to make plain, fresh fruit and marbled cheeseckes.

And don't forget the restaurant, featuring French onion soup, grilled salmon, stuffed baked potatoes, as well as salads (with Dairy Treats home-made salad dressings), sandwiches and other delicacies.

Catering is a popular feature of Dairy Treats, especially crisp vegetables and dip, fresh fruit or fish trays and dairy platters.

Many kosher ingredients

Les Rosenberg and his wife Susan, owners of Boro Park Kosher Mart in the heart of the Bathurst-Lawrence shopping area, have a simple goal — to provide people who like to cook with as many strictly kosher ingredients as they need for their recipes.

"My wife Susan loves to cook, so she is always looking for new ideas and products. And our five children love to sample our new cheeses!" Rosenberg says.

They are constantly upgrading their services and selection. They already feature Kernel Bakery mouthwatering and wholesome breads and challahs; and many cheeses, such as feta cheese from Israel and Danish havarti, which are imported in bulk.

Rosenberg will soon also have on his shelves new French and Israeli cheeses, fresh pasta, Israeli caviar and bulk tofu.

As well, he is adding new European-manufactured machines which will slice, shred and vacuum pack cheeses.

"We welcome inquiries and requests for special ingredients," says Rosenberg. "Some may be difficult to fill, because we are strictly kosher (under the Kashruth Council), but we will always try our very best to accommodate you."

Naturally, quality sells at Westhill Dairy

Stephen Waldman, president of Westhill Dairy, and his partner Abe Gomel (of Liberty Brands Montreal) believe in producing only all-natural quality dairy products.

Their feeling is the consumer wants dairy products with no additives or stabilizers, that still have a good fresh taste.

"Don't be fooled because products have longer code dates that the product is actually fresher," says Waldman. "Since we don't add any chemicals to our products, we may not have as long a code date as some of our competitors; read the ingredients and then compare the product's quality".

Abe Gomel, president of Liberty Brand Products spends most of his time in Montreal researching new products. Travelling throughout the United States, Europe and Russia, he has developed a variety of different flavors for yogurt, Russian kefir and quark. Gomel enjoys experimenting with new product lines to keep ahead of the marketplace. These products are also shared with Westhill for production or distribution.

The success of Westhill for so many years is due to the fact that they still produce the products the way they did 60 years ago when the company was originally started. Using cheese bags to drain the cottage and cream cheese means the operation requires a lot of manual labor but ensures the taste. Employees are still with the company after 20-25 years.

Flavored cream cheeses

"We are proud that these people, who have been with us for many years, still continue to contribute their ideas and knowledge" Waldman says. "If we automate too much, the product will loose the quality and taste we are after. Therefore, don't fix it if it's not broken."

Waldman's family, who started the business over 50 years ago, believed in operating the business in a family sort of way. Today that feeling hasn't changed and all the employees feel they are part of the business and know that they contribute to the success of Westhill.

"Stephen still comes in at 5:30 every morning and is there at 8:00 at night," one employee says. "He is involved with all aspects of the daily operation, which contributes to our success."

Waldman feels the experience he got from his family, taking courses at the University of Guelph and his employment at Astro Dairy helped him immensely. While at Astro, he was involved with the development of their cream cheese and pressed cottage cheese. This helped him when he returned to Westhill in 1988.

New products on the lighter side of the scale have sold well in the past year. Light cream cheese (15 per cent fat) and dry cottage cheese (0.1 per cent fat) have contributed to new successful product lines. Flavored light cream cheeses are being developed now and should be on the market by the time this article is in the paper. "They are great tasting and interesting flavors" Waldman says.

The distribution of other quality products has also helped Westhill's business. Tropicana Orange Juice,

Superb taste

Tasty Batter Muffin Mix, Snapple, Evian and Koala are just some the the lines Westhill sell.

Two products that have started to sell well lately are Fresh Fruit Salad CA Brand, and Metropolitan Ice Cream and Ices; these are of the top quality expected of Westhill. The fruit salad is freshly cut and tastes superb.

The fruit ices are also made from fresh fruit that has been strained and frozen. "The Metropolitan Rich and Creamy line of ice cream is rich and smooth and beats all other products out there," says Waldman.

All Westhill dairy products are under the supervision of the Kashrut Council.

A Shayna Maidel unbelievable

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The trouble with A Shayna Maidel is that the 70-year-old father Mordechai Weiss is not a believable character. Is it possible that a father who has not seen his daughter for 16 years would not rush to embrace her, or that he would refuse the loan of money to rescue his wife from the Holocaust?

In this play, by Barbara Lebow, running until May 14 at the NYPA Studio Theatre, we are asked to accept that Weiss is so stiff-necked that, though living in New York since 1926 with one daughter, he turns down money offered to him by relatives to bring over his wife and an older daughter.

And we are also asked to believe that within a minute or two of hearing that her older sister, Lusia, was still alive and coming to New York, the younger sister, Rose, would complain that her apartment is too small for the two of them. "What am I supposed to do with her, it's not fair, it's all your fault, Poppa," she says.

Though the New Globe Theatre and its energetic artistic director, Janese Kane, are a welcome addition to the Toronto theatre scene, A Shayna Maidel is an unfortunate vehicle for its inaugural.

There is no solid core to the play. Granted, there could be resentment by one sister against the other, though their arguments over food and the American way of life must sound trivial to any Holocaust survivor. The plot doesn't hold water unless you can believe that Mordechai Weiss, for reasons unknown, abandoned the rest of his family to the Nazis.

An attempt to give depth by recreating the family's life in Poland, through Lusia's fantasies, fails because director Al Waxman does not sustain a clear demarcation between real life and fantasy. There are few lighting and sound cues to help the transition.

The cast principals, Sharon Bernbaum and Shannon Lawson, as the sisters, and Harvey Atkin as Mordechai, cannot be faulted. It is the play which sabotages their considerable efforts. The same is true of Andrew Akman, Henriette Ivanana and Maya Swadron in the lesser roles.

If there is anything to be learned from A Shayna Maidel it is that you can't design a worthwhile play about the Holocaust unless the elements are genuine. It pales into insignificance beside other Holocaust plays such as The Deputy and Ghetto.

Moroccan-born Bensimon heads province's French TV network

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —"To be a francophone in Ontario is quite similar to my experience as a Jew in the world — you're constantly in the minority," says Moroccan-born Jacques Bensimon, managing director of TVOntario's French-language television network, la Chaine.

Well-spoken in both official languages, the 51-year-old Bensimon draws parallels between Ontario's native French-speaking population and its Jewish community. Both, he says, feel compelled to protect their somewhat precarious cultures from assimilation.

"(Ontario's francophones) need the schools, the community structures and other social elements so that the young people, although completely bilingual, won't be assimilated into the vast melting pot, American-style."

While studying film in New York, Bensimon distinguished himself as a filmmaker to such a degree that he was instantly snatched up on graduation by the National Film Board of Canada, where he made some 30 documentaries of various lengths. He also worked for the United Nations for several years, assembling a library of film on human settlements around the globe.

"Many of my films were attached in one way or another to my Jewish identity. One film in particular — Twenty Years After, which I made in the mid-1970s, caused some controversy in Quebec," he recalls. The film presented an uncomfortable portrait of the newly-arrived immigrant community of Moroccan Jews, caught between the provincial government's fervent pressure upon them to speak French and the equally fervent wish of the Jewish community that they join the Anglo-Jewish community.

Later, he completed Moroccan Trilogy, which partly told the tale of his own return as a Jew to the Arab land in which he was born. Welcomed into the inner court of Moroccan royalty, Bensimon won the confidence of King Hassan II and walked away with three hours of exclusive footage. The three-part documentary also focused on Moroccan independence and the Saharan conflict with Mauritania.

Bensimon joined TVO's French network in 1986, before it had started broadcasting. Grinning, he recalls the difficulties of forging a new network with astonishingly scant resources. "We had no production, no stock, no acquisition, no production expertise ... we had to reinvent the process."

Initially, Quebec's film distributors insisted on top dollars for their wares, but Bensimon refused to pay prices that had been scaled for commercial stations with much larger audiences than la Chaine could hope to reach. Instead, he bypassed Quebec and found European distributors who would accept his money. Eventually, he says, the Quebec industry came crawling back.

Much of the programming on la Chaine may be enjoyed by non-French-speaking viewers, the network chief asserts. The station regularly features subtitled movies, jazz concerts, opera, ballet and other events that require little knowledge of any particular spoken language.

Like TVO's English network, a trademark of la Chaine is weekly feature films, offered on Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings.

Rebbe subject of film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the seriously ill rebbe of the Lubavitcher Chassidim, is the subject of The King of Crown Heights, scheduled to be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 5.

Ruggero Gabbai's cinematic portrait of the rebbe and the movement he leads is sympathetic, though not uncritical.

The documentary unfolds through the eyes of Misha, a fictionalized Russian Jewish jobless immigrant who's introduced to Lubavitch by sheer chance.

It should be noted that much of the footage was shot before the rebbe's near-fatal stroke about a year ago. Nevertheless, the material remains topical.

The camera pans on Rabbi Schneerson as he reads from a holy book, as he hands out dollar bills to his devotees, as he moves through a throng of awed acolytes, and as he is feted on his 90th birthday.

Described in superlatives, the charismatic rebbe is said to possess special powers and immense learning. A pious silversmith who gushes over him claims that the rebbe can peer into the future.

Despite his orthodoxy, the rebbe is wordly. Before he assumed his position in 1951, he lived in the secular world, studying electrical engineering in Europe.

The movement, we learn, caters to those who are driven by a yearning to belong to something greater than themselves. As one young disciple in a Mitzvah van suggests, the rebbe's followers are like children, while the rebbe is like a wise father who commands total obedience.

Lubavitch is lauded for promoting piety and bringing Soviet Jews into the fold of Judaism. But Rabbi Marc Angel of the Rabbinical Council of America wonders whether the Messiah concept, which the rebbe's aides have ardently championed, will ultimately harm its cause.

Operation Shylock quite a mishmash

Operation Shylock by Philip Roth
Random House paperback $16

This novel first appeared in 1993; now published as a paperback it provides an opportunity for reappraisal.

The critical reactions then were mixed. Yale University's Harold Bloom hailed it as "one of Roth's grand inventions." Time magazine choose it as one of the best books of the year. But others — granting the author his inventiveness — found it convoluted and difficult to follow, the characters stilted mouthpieces for Roth's jumbled ideas and the talk unending and boring.

The plot goes something like this. In Israel a man who calls himself Philip Roth is trying to usurp the identity of the real Philip Roth. This imposter preaches that Jews should return to Europe before the Arabs grow in strength and create a second Holocaust. The real Roth flies to Israel to unmask his double. He threatens legal action against his doppelganger whom he calls Moishe Pipik.

The story gets increasingly confusing with the introduction of Pipik's gentile girlfriend, the real Roth's confusion about his identity as he begins to spout anti-Zionism and his unwitting acceptance of a million dollar cheque from a crippled philanthropist.

In addition, the reader must absorb such events as Roth's kidnapping, his undertaking of a secret mission for the Mossad — and a cast of characters that include an accused war criminal and Palestinian exiles.

All in all Operation Shylock is quite a mishmash laced with the author's zany humor, brilliant rambling ruminations on a variety of subjects, and steamy sexual episodes. How to evaluate this wildly imaginative comic dance is still uncertain, but after 20 books Roth still has the power to surprise, confuse, entertain and infuriate.

EYE ON ARTS

Toronto Jewish Folk Choir: Sixty-eight years ago, a group of immigrant Jewish garment workers on D'Arcy Street in downtown Toronto joined together to form the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, which performed its first spring concert in 1926.

"We think it's the oldest continuous Jewish musical institution in Canada. Very few other musical organizations can say they're having a 68th annual spring concert." says Ben Shek, whose mother Bella joined the choir in 1934 and sang with it until she turned 90 only three years ago.

Shek recalls the choir's glory days in the 1940s and 1950s, when it sang with leading artists like Jan Peerce and Paul Robeson at Massey Hall.

Works by Srul Irving Glick, Ben Steinberg and John Weinzweig are scheduled for performance at the choir's 68th annual spring concert. Guest artists include Suzanne Shulman on flute and Sigal Hechtlinger on clarinet. Choir director Esther Ghan Firestone conducts all selections except the Steinberg segment, to be conducted by the composer himself.

The concert takes place at Rosedale Heights Secondary School (711 Bloor St. E., Toronto), Sunday May 15, 3 p.m. Tickets are $12 ($10 for seniors; $6 for students and the unwaged), available at Jewish bookstores and at the door.

New trade theory

Elhanan Helpman

The world is in the midst of a technological revolution where major advances are producing wrenching social and economic change. At the same time, Israel is experiencing its own revolution — one that is taking the country from a place of conflict to a place where peace may one day reign. No one knows better how such changes will affect the world at large and Israel in particular than Professor Elhanan Helpman, a leading Israeli and international economist and the new Director of the Economic Growth Program at The Canadian Institute for Advanced Research.

As the Archie Sherman professor of International Economic Relations at Tel Aviv University since 1988, Helpman, 49, resides in Tel Aviv with his wife and two children. His role at the Canadian Institute, which brings him to Toronto a few times a year, is to develop a deeper understanding of the processes of economic growth as it is driven by the evolution of technology.

Born in Dzalabad, U.S.S.R., Helpman holds a PhD degree in Economics from Harvard University, is the author of nine publications, and has devoted his adult life to economic research. He is co-founder of "the new trade theory" that emphasizes the role of economies of scale and imperfect competition in global competition.

Helpman was in Toronto recently where he spoke with CJN contributor Lori Dennis.

CJN: Israel is experiencing sound economic growth. Reserves of hard currency are at the largest amount ever; exports are growing tremendously. Gross Domestic Product per capita is growing and new jobs are being created. Is it important to the Israeli economy for the peace process to continue? What impact do you think peace will have on economic growth?

Helpman: There is an opinion expressed by many that is optimistic. They expect that the peace process will affect the economy. I agree, but I see things occurring in two ways — short-term and long-term effects, which are quite different from one another.

CJN: What are the short-term effects that peace will have on the Israeli economy?

Helpman: In the short term, Israeli companies will be gaining access to countries with which we don't have diplomatic or economic relations presently: Indonesia, Malaysia, the Far East and Third World countries. In fact, the peace process has already opened up the market in both directions. There has also been a change in country risk. By that I mean that significant foreign investment will take place because companies will see Israel as less of a risk. Right now we have some foreign companies — Motorola and Intel, for example. They have taken a chance, but the flow of foreign investment has been very low. Hopefully, more capital intensive type of investments will take place.

CJN: What are the long term economic effects of peace in the Middle East?

Helpman: These are much slower to evolve. There may be long-term benefits from trading with immediate neighbors such as Palestine and Egypt and more distant neighbors such as Saudi Arabia and the Emirates, but I don't see major prospects in the near future. Even if peace was achieved immediately, it would take a long time for these to materialize.

You must first look at the structure of the region and why there is so little trade between these countries now. In the Middle East, inter-regional trade is lower than any other geographical region in the world. That's because, apart from oil, most of these countries are self-sustaining. They all do their own farming, make their own textiles, so that they don't need neighbor countries who are offering the same commodities. Also, countries that have different income per capita don't tend to trade with each other and Israel's income per capita is 15 times as high as Egypt, 10 times as high as Jordan and five times as high as Syria. On the other hand, lower income per capita can rise in times of peace so that regions with proper economic integration may open up to each other. When there is less disparity and the income per capita differential is reduced, there will be much to be gained.

Another long-term benefit is the reduction in military spending. Presently, our spending is three times as high as in the United States and five times as high as in the European community, relative to national income. Israel's military budget is about 10 - 12 per cent of our national income. In the short run, this will not be reduced at all because there are huge costs associated with deploying forces and besides, it will take years for Israelis to gain the trust required to lay down their arms. However, over the course of many years, there will be a peace dividend.

CJN: Several months ago, Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin made a public comment that he believes Israel should not be a charity case. For so long, people in the Diaspora have maintained close relations to Israel by making charitable donations. If there is a general consensus on this opinion, how can these physical bonds be maintained?

Helpman: This is not a new theme. Ever since I can remember, since the '60s and right through the '70s and '80s, Israel has wanted to be less dependent on outside support. Over the years, donations have not declined but our economy has grown much bigger so that we can be somewhat more self-sufficient. And many organizations have gone beyond giving more donations and have instead adopted research institutions, hospitals and schools. The New Israel Fund, for example, refuses to give money to the government directly and has channelled it to particular projects instead.

CJN: In the March 10 issue of The CJN, it was reported that Nathan Sharony, the new professor and chief executive officer of State of Israel Bonds, said that despite Beilin's comments, Israeli Bonds are one of the most important vehicles to the Israeli government. What is your opinion on the future of Israeli Bonds?

Helpman: Bonds are a significant vehicle for raising foreign funds. They are a reliable source in times of economic strain. But there are also times when they are less significant such as now when the economy is strong and when Israel has obtained guarantees from the United States. But bonds are used as a reserve — it's important for Israel to maintain this mechanism.

CJN: What is the present state of Israel's economy? Where do you see it heading?

Helpman: Some major changes have taken place. We've certainly come a long way from 10 years ago when we had 500 per cent inflation and foreign and domestic debt were at an all time high. Thanks to the stabilization program implemented in 1985, Israel's economy has changed dramatically and we now have a growth rate of six or seven per cent. Without these changes, we would never have been able to face the huge influx of immigrants that have been arriving since 1990. I see our economy getting stronger and stronger all the time, especially with the prospect of new foreign investment and new technology.

CJN: What's happening on the Israeli job front. Where does unemployment stand at the moment and how has it been affected by the absorption of highly trained Soviet immigrants?

Helpman: With the economy growing, we're experiencing declining unemployment — from 11 per cent in 1991 to nine per cent in the last quarter. One hundred thousand more jobs have been created, which is significant when you consider that we have a labor force of two million. But the olim are not getting the jobs that they would like to match their skill levels. There are some occupations in which they find suitable jobs, such as in various areas of engineering or in applied maths. In areas like software engineering, for example, there are no mismatches between what they know and what's expected of them. But for some occupations, such as Russian economists or doctors, their training just doesn't match the job here and their skills are not up to standard.

CJN: With the recent resignation of the Israeli Health Minister Haim Ramon when his proposed changes to the health bill were defeated (mandating universal health insurance), what do you think will happen to the health care system?

Helpman: There are two issues in the health bill. One is to allow for universal health coverage. The second is to allow individuals to choose their own health maintenance organization. What Ramon asked for in his piece of legislation was to take the issue of health maintenance out of the control of the labor unions. Needless to say, the Labor Party was not too pleased. In my opinion, our health care system is not working well. Because it is dominated by various labor unions, the system ends up employing more people than necessary, there are many hospital strikes and the hospitals are crowded and inefficient. What we need is more competition between alternate health maintenance organizations to prevent doctors from treating unnecessarily and to generate less waste. The health care system needs incentives to economize and to be more efficient.

CJN: With this new techno-economic paradigm shift that we're experiencing, where major technological advances are producing major social and economic change worldwide, what changes must Israel make to become a stronger, wealthier and more viable country in keeping with the times?

Helpman: Unfortunately, we can't design a transformation the way we'd like to see it take place. All we can do is look at the processes that are occurring and determine what kind of institutions and policies are needed to support this change.

Technological changes have ramifications for every aspect of the economy both in Israel and elsewhere. First of all, we must look at changes in manufacturing and ways to become more flexible. For example, when we build plants, we must be able to shift to new products without incurring great expense. We must find ways to absorb new technology without having to abolish existing structures.

We have to pay more attention to research and development within companies and learn from other countries. And we have to take a new look at the way businesses are being financed. Traditionally, banks give loans against physical collateral such as machinery and equipment. But now we have to look at what it means to give loans using ideas as collateral. Financial institutions both here and in Israel are beginning to look at things in a new way and respond to these new demands in a way that will satisfy the regulatory environment in which they operate.

Another area that we are looking at is what we call changes in human capital. We need to be more flexible in our educational institutions so that people are trained for a variety of different jobs.

With the development of computers and information technology that follows, we're experiencing a big shift in the economy. But there is typically a long lag that follows before we feel the impact.

Local firm exports luxury homes

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The idea of owning a luxury Canadian-built home is for many a dream. Now it is possible to own one — in Israel.

Brothers Yoram and Erez Weinreich of Reikh International Limited are currently working on the housing project known as Rondor, located in Caesaria.

According to the brothers, there is a new quality of living in Israel. In the last 15 to 20 years, Israel's economy has slowly shifted away from the traditional agrarian, "outside" society to one that has developed an industrial base. This growth has been accompanied by a corresponding urban sprawl as Israelis move inside.

Erez notes that this project offers many features the Canadian construction industry has to offer. For example, where Israeli-contructed homes don't include central heat or air conditioning, the Rondor homes do.

Other selling points within the Israeli real estate market are the garage, the basement, pressure-treated decks, and the "dry system" construction.

This system means plumbing and electrical components are incorporated into the house in such a way that it's not like a search and destroy mission" when it is time to do repairs.

A repair job that would normally take six months can be done in six hours. A little drywall and the job is done!

Yoram points out that 80 per cent of their product is Canadian. Depending on the size and model of the home and the site, prices for these luxury homes begin around $400,000 (US).

And who will buy these homes?

Erez says they are targeting the top 5 to 10 per cent of the local Israeli market. However, he is quick to point out that for those who make frequent business trips to Israel or who have family members traveling back and forth, it makes sense to invest in a home rather than pay for an expensive hotel.

It seems the primary rule of real estate in the Canadian market is true everywhere — location is key. Rondor is conveniently located so that "it takes the same distance from downtown Toronto to Richmond Hill" to get to some of the major attractions.

Yoram says the Israeli market is "hot". He says Reikh International entered the market at the right time with a quality product and began selling.

He adds that while the Israeli realty market is entering a new stage, he and his brother are ahead environmentally and in construction techniques. "We are fast, we offer nice finishings and a good-quality product. My brother and I saw an opportunity to export product technology and expertise."

Canadian governments are looking to make economic relations between the two countries easier. Premier Bob Rae is interested in facilitating trade, says Yoram, and the United States, along with the European countries, have established free trade with Israel.

This is not the Weinreichs' first project in Israel. Reikh International Ltd., was formed in 1981 to export North American-style building supplies including metal studs, drywall and insulation to Israel.

Then, in the fall of 1992, the company, along with Viceroy homes in Scarborough, submitted a bid to build prefabricated homes in Israel to accommodate the influx of Russian immigrants. Erez says the bid was not accepted due to cost considerations.

The fact that Yoram and Erez are concentrating in the home renovation and building supply sector is not unusual. They are the faces of The Lumber Guys, a Toronto-based business.

Born to Holocaust survivors, Erez and his sister were born in Israel; Yoram, in Toronto. All had a Zionist upbringing.

Between Yoram and Erez, they have 30 years experience in retailing, exporting and the construction business.

Eventually, the company will be looking for joint ventures but for now, they will content themselves by looking into three or four other prospects.

Tips From Pros

By GARY KOPSTICK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When an individual wishes to plan his or her estate, utilizing both effective estate planning techniques and compliance with Jewish law (Halachah), it may at first glance appear that the objectives desired meet with conflicting rules and principles.

However, there are legal mechanisms which can be utilized such that an effective estate plan can be designed which will comply not only with family financial objectives but also with Halachah. Let us consider the following example in the context of financial planning and Halachah.

Joseph Aleph wishes to effect an estate plan in reference to his existing assets. He is married to Rachelle and they have four children. His oldest child is a son, Aaron; he has another son, Eli, and two daughters, Sarah and Leah.

Joseph's estate is currently comprised of universal life insurance of $1 million. There is an identical policy on the life of Rachelle. He has an RRSP which has accumulated $250,000. In addition, Joseph is the sole shareholder and operator of a food distributorship business. He started the corporation before marriage and its estimated current fair market value is $2 million. Joseph has cash and near cash investments of a further $100,000 and owns a condominium in Florida which has an approximate value of $60,000.

Joseph's personal wishes include the following considerations: Aaron has become a valued employee in the business and Joseph would like Aaron to succeed him as the operator of the business. In the event of his untimely death, Joseph would want his assets to be available to support his wife, i.e., the annual income from his estate should go to his wife. Joseph would like the capital in his estate to be available for eventual distribution equally to his four children. In addition, Joseph has provided for charitable bequests of approximately $100,000 upon his demise.

Tax Considerations — An individual is considered to dispose of capital property (e.g., shares in the business at their fair market value) immediately before death. This would result in a capital gain at death equal to the current fair market value of the corporation. However, an individual may transfer capital property to a spouse or to a qualifying spousal trust on a tax deferred basis. Such a spousal trust must provide that all of the income of the trust must be payable to the surviving spouse and that no one but the surviving spouse may enjoy the income or capital of the trust during his or her lifetime. The trust may provide for the payment of capital to the surviving spouse but need not do so.

An individual is also deemed to realize the proceeds in an RRSP at death and would be taxable thereon. However, once again the money in the RRSP can be transferred on a tax deferred basis to a surviving spouse's RRSP. In that manner, a spouse may use the RRSP proceeds as funds for her own retirement or for current living expenses, by drawing funds out of the RRSP on a yearly basis or as otherwise needed.

Charitable gifts made by a deceased in his will are eligible for the tax credit in the terminal (i.e. final) tax return of the deceased. Provided that donations do not exceed 20 per cent of the final year's net income, such donations will generally yield a tax saving to the deceased's estate of about 50¢ per $1 of donatioon.

In order to save on Ontario Probate Fees, certain assets such as cash and cash equivalents might be registered in the joint name of Joseph and Rachelle. At law, this would mean that Rachelle automatically owns such investments immediately after Joseph's death. Moreover, if the RRSP were also designated to go to Rachelle, it too would escape probate fee levy.

Halachic Principles — A surviving wife has the right to collect the amount stipulated in her ketubah (Jewish marriage contract) or has a right to support as long as she remains unmarried. This is likely the first priority against the estate.

Minor daughters have priority rights over minor sons for support. Moreover, daughters have a right to a Dowry to ensure they will be desirable future mates re marriage. These rights rank second upon the estate.

Under Halachah, where there are legitimate male heirs, the female members of the family do not inherit. Where there are male sons surviving the deceased parent, only the sons are technically entitled to share in the inheritance. If the eldest child in the family is a son, the eldest receives an additional share of the estate. For example, where there are four surviving sons, the estate would be divided into five parts with the eldest taking two-fifths of the estate.

If there are no male sons surviving the deceased, the deceased's surviving father or brothers would also rank ahead of the surviving wife and daughters vis-a-vis inheritance.

Whereas life insurance is generally considered to be an asset of the estate under general commercial law, Halachah does not consider life insurance as an estate asset. Rather, the named beneficiary under the policy is considered to be the halachic owner of the proceeds.

Considerations — It is clear from the above discussion that there are often conflicting principles between good estate planning from a tax perspective and halachic principles. It should be noted that it is, however, possible to draw appropriate legal documents which are considered to be bona fide for halachic purposes while still achieving effective estate planning. This could involve creating indebtedness of the father on a contingent basis to either his wife or daughters. For example one can structure such an instrument and the result meets both good estate planning objectives and halachic principles.

This article is beyond the scope of resolving such complexities, but with the guidance of your local Orthodox rabbi and related professional advice, the issues can be successfully resolved in most cases.

Business Briefs

Free Trade Fuels Israel's Economy

ISRAEL — While many Canadians continue to agonize over free trade with the United States, Israel credits free trade for its economic growth spurt.

The latest edition of Advantage Israel, published by Israel's Economic Mission in North America, cites free trade agreements with the United States and Europe as contributing strongly to heightened Israeli exports and foreign investment.

"For Canadian companies, investing in Israel offers tariff-free access to parts of the world that would not be available from here," says Ren Noy, Israel's economic consul in Canada.

Ontario premier Bob Rae is urgently lobbying for a free trade pact between Israel and Canada. He recently signed an Ontario-Israel economic agreement, pledging the promotion of cooperative agreements between provincial companies and those in Israel.

Hi-Tech Talk

ISRAEL — Just about every week, Israeli companies are coming up with futuristic hi-tech concepts. The latest could leave computer users chained to their chairs.

Integrated Technology Inc. has come up with a device called CompuPhone that allows computer users to make calls directly from their keyboard. CompuPhone made its global debut in Jerusalem.

And in Petah Tikvah, E.I.M. International Electronics has announced a system that brings TV broadcasts to your PC screen.

A viewer can carry on with his computer tasks and watch television at the same time.

Koffler Gallery patrons mix and mingle at gala

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Koffler Gallery has earned a unique reputation for the excellence of its exhibitions, says Dorothy Shoichet, president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

A Patrons' Gala was held recently at the Gallery, with Harriet Solomon as chair of the patrons' campaign.

After a dinner hosted by Marvelle and Murray Koffler, honorary chair of the Koffler Centre, patrons were given a preview of the Collector's Eye, an exhibit of ceramics from the collection of Aaron Milrad.

Curated by Lloyd Herman, the founding director of the Smithsonian Institute's Renwick Gallery in Washington, the outstanding collection represents major trends in contemporary Canadian, American and British ceramics.

Milrad, chair emeritus of the Koffler Centre, is one of Toronto's most successful art lawyers and an avid collector of paintings and photographs, as well as of pottery and ceramics.

In her introduction, Solomon said, "We are here to share many of [Milrad's] choice works, exhibited for the first time, and regarded as one of the finest ceramic collections in North America."

She noted that both the Royal Ontario Museum and the Gardiner Museum wanted Milrad's exhibition. "How excited and privileged the Koffler Gallery is that Aaron has so generously opted to let it be shown here."

G. Alfred Kennedy, the consul general of the United States in Toronto, who officially opened the Collector's Eye exhibit said we recognize "the diversity and experience of each artist and in so doing, we celebrate the cultural vitality of our two great countries."

Acknowledging the importance of technology, he added, "It is art that has the effect of bringing us back to basics — our interpretation of our environment and the meaning of life." Beautiful art, he concluded, "links us inextricably to each other, to our past, to history."

As a token of appreciation, Solomon presented the consul general with a ceramic bowl created by Canadian ceramist Peter Powning. She explained that the first significant piece purchased by Milrad in 1982 was created by Powning.

Milrad's ceramics collection includes more than 300 pieces. On exhibit at the Koffler Gallery is the craftsmanship of more than 50 artists. The impressive collection is colorful and eclectic. There are examples of realism, abstract, expressionism, surrealism, and oriental and other schools of artistic design.

Some of the artists included in Milrad's representation are, Powning, Adrian Saxe, David Gilhooly, Peter Voulkos, Suzanne Stephenson, Neil Tetkowski, Anne Kraus, Viola Frey, Richard Milette, and Paul Mathieu.

Milrad recalls that he first became aware of ceramics through his mother's collected pieces of British pottery. He also took pottery and ceramic courses at the Ontario College of Art.

Among the guests of honor at the gala was Mayer Kirshenblatt whose folk paintings of Jewish life in Poland between 1920 and 1934 are exhibited in the Koffler Loggia Gallery. Kirshenblatt's paintings document the painter's memories of pre-war Jewish cuture in Poland.

The Milrad and Kirshenblatt exhibitions continue to June 1. The Koffler Gallery is located at 4588 Bathurst St. in North York and open Sunday to Friday from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. and Wednesday evenings from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Senior receives volunteer award

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Gizella Katona marched up to collect her Volunteer of the Year award from Mayor Mel Lastman last month, it was to a standing ovation.

Katona, 84, was one of 14 city residents chosen as a 1994 Volunteer of the Year. The April 13 presentations coincided with National Volunteer Week.

Katona founded the Institute for Renewed Education, a non-profit organization that teaches volunteer skills to seniors, nine years ago. Since then, the former math teacher has retrained over 300 students. She herself has just begun her PhD in mathematics and computer studies at York University.

Each year for the last 10 years North York has honored between 10 and 20 volunteers, nominated by their supervisors and selected by a five-member committee.

At 17, Weinroth was the youngest volunteer to be recognized and one of three Jews. Weinroth, who prefers the nickname Yitzi, has been volunteering every summer at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care since he was 13 and "had nothing else to do."

The Grade 12 student at Forest Hill Collegiate spends five days a week visiting with some of the 1,500 seniors who make up the Baycrest community and taking them on outings to Toronto's Harbourfront, Centre Island and the movies.

"My classmates ask me 'How can you spend your summers with a bunch of old people?' " he says. "I tell them I like knowing that I've helped somebody or made them smile."

Millie Jacobs also likes to make people smile. That is why the retired real estate agent joined the innovative Generations in Various Exchange (GIVE) program at York Mills Collegiate when it began in 1989. During the school year, Jacobs, 69, spends time sensitizing 75 Grade 11 students on what it means to grow old. Jabobs said three of her nieces and nephews went to York Mills, but she wanted to volunteer there because of her interest in teenagers. "It's another life," she enthused.

Lefko downplayed her award. "[Volunteering] is something I just do naturally, that's all."

Lefko, 59, was recognized for her work with Leukemia Research Fund. She became involved when her 21-year-old daughter, Robyn, died of acute myelogenous leukemia 10 years ago. Lefko is the fund's immediate past president. Last year she and 400 others raised $750,000 for research into a cure.

SHAVUOT ART

Shavuot inspired an interesting art form in Eastern Europe — paper-cuts. Called Shavuoslach or Raizelach, they bore Jewish symbols and motifs, such as the menorah or the four "Jewish folk animals," and were pasted on windows during the festival. Pictured here is Ruth Stern Warzecha's personal interpretation of a traditional Shavuot theme. [Collection of Dr. Fred Weinberg]

PLO seeks delays as its police teams wait at the border

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As the first contingent of Palestinian police prepared to take up duties in the Gaza Strip and Jericho, the PLO told Israel over the weekend it needed more time before assuming complete control of the two areas.

Highlighting the delay in implementing the self-rule accord signed last week in Cairo, groups of Palestinian police gathered at Egyptian and Jordanian border crossings but did not take over Israel Defence Force postings on schedule.

PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat said he needs more time to name the 24-member Palestinian Authority, which will have overall responsibility for directing Palestinian affairs in Gaza and Jericho.

Arafat had asked for more time to implement the accord when he and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin met last week in Cairo to sign the final agreement for implementing limited Palestinian autonomy.

Some 330 Palestinian police, in crisp new olive green uniforms and red berets, gathered Sunday at the Egyptian side of Rafiah, the border town separating Gaza from Egypt.

But it remained unclear when they would cross into Gaza and take over from the IDF the duties of maintaining law and order.

According to one report, the police would wait in Rafiah until several other contingents, trained in Libya, Iraq, Yemen and Sudan, joined them there.

According to The Jerusalem Post, eight unarmed Palestinian police officers crossed into Gaza Sunday, but none via the Allenby Bridge, disappointing many who had waited both in Jericho and Rafiah for a triumphal procession of hundreds of members of the new force.

Israeli military sources denied responsibility for the delays and said the Palestinian side was responsible for not coordinating the transfer of power properly.

At the Rafiah border crossing, the arriving officers handed over hundreds of Kalashnikov assault rifles for Israeli inspection and registration of the serial numbers.

The delay in the policemen's arrival stirred anger in both Jericho and the Gaza Strip.

Youths started stoning the police station when they realized that IDF soldiers were not leaving and the Israeli flag was not coming down. Soldiers fired back with stun grenades.

Government sources said there is no reason why hundreds of Palestinian police could not take up positions in Gaza and Jericho this week. Up to 30 military installations are ready to be manned, according to military sources.

Whatever its cause, the delay heightened doubts among Palestinians that Arafat is ready to take over the areas now at his disposal. He recently closed the Jericho office of the PLO and there has been grumbling about his autocratic leadership.

IDF officials reported meanwhile that five large police installations in Gaza have been emptied of Israeli troops and are ready to receive the Palestinian police.

Israelis protest peace accord

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Last week's signing of the Israel-PLO autonomy accord sparked anti-government protests throughout the country.

At Neveh Dekalim in Gush Katif, about 1,500 people — including a number who were fasting — held a prayer vigil. Schools were closed in the area to enable pupils to attend the demonstration.

"This is not peace. Peace you make from a position of strength, force, heroism. Not from a sense of weakness," Gush Katif Chief Rabbi Yigal Kaminetzky told the crowd.

Gaza Council head Zvi Hendel received enthusiastic applause when he went up to the stage during the mini-crisis in the signing ceremony and told the crowd there were problems in Cairo.

In Jerusalem, protesters burned two tires at a demonstration in front of the prime minister's office. One of the protesters was detained for questioning.

On the other side of the political spectrum, a few hundred Peace Now activists went to the Erez checkpoint to demonstrate support for the agreement. They were joined by a number of Palestinians from Khan Yunis, who voiced their support from the other side of the fence.

Montreal Sephardi school daubed with swastikas

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Only six months after students moved in, the new, permanent home of the College Hillel in St. Laurent was daubed with multiple swastikas and hate messages during the night of May 5-6 — the first case of serious anti-Semitic daubing in the Montreal area in more than a year.

At least ten swastikas were plastered over the back windows of the building at the corner of Alexis Nihon Boulevard and Ward Street.

On the front of the building located on an industrial street and formerly the site of a warehouse, several other swastikas and anti-Semitic phrases, such as "Go Home Jews," were spray-painted with foot-high letters.

One window at the back of the Sephardi school was also shattered.

"I was absolutely stunned," Ben-Simon said. "It's a tragedy for us."

She immediately notified the school's president, Armand Elbaz, and police from Station 22, who began to investigate the incident.

But at writing, it was not clear whether the incident was the work of racists and neo-Nazis or vandals.

The College Hillel has also been the subject of a zoning dispute. But Michael Crelinsten, Canadian-Jewish Congress, Quebec region's (CJC-Q) executive director, said there was no indication at this time that the daubings were connected to opposition to the area's being rezoned for the school.

In a statement, CJC-Q community relation chair Max Bernard called the assault a despicable act.

"It is particularly regrettable that the younger members of our community, in this case the students of College Hillel, must be exposed to such a vile expression of anti-Semitism and racism," he said.

"The residents of St. Laurent, along with all Quebecers, must act together to adopt measures to prevent the recurrence of this phenomenon."

Congress also called for Montreal Urban Community police to conduct a "full inquiry" into the incident and to pursue the individual(s) responsible "to the fullest extent of the law."

Ian Kagedan, B'nai Brith Canada's director of government relations, said from Ottawa that the attack might have signalled the end of a "lull" in racist incidents over the last year in the Ottawa-Montreal corridor.

Teens get glimpse into Jewish history

March of the Living

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The recent 1994 March of the Living was a marvellous catalyst for participants to reaffirm their Jewishness, says Rabbi Mark Dratch of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Rabbi Dratch was one of the midrachim (chaperones) who accompanied the 121 teenagers from Ontario to Poland and Israel. More than 350 Canadian students between 15 and 18 took part.

"The program exposed them to the depths of death and despair of the camps, engaged them in an exploration of the richness of Jewish life in pre-war Poland, and fostered a bond between many second- and third-generation Canadians [through visiting] the home of their grandparents," said Rabbi Dratch.

"The March was an opportunity for Jewish history to become real and alive."

More than 6,000 students from around the world participated in the two-week gathering. They visited synagogues and cemeteries, relived the bitterness of the Shoah, and celebrated the re-establishment of the State of Israel.

Cary Chapnick, a Grade 11 student at Forest Hill Collegiate, said the March changed his life. "We went from seeing 800,000 pairs of old shoes in Majdanek to seeing a plane full of Russian Jews arrive in Israel."

The group visited Treblinka, Plazsow, Oskar Schindler's factory, Warsaw, Krakow and other "dark and depressing places," said Chapnik, but they danced and sang after arriving in Israel. "I felt at home — and I was."

The 6,000 marched from Auschwitz to Birkenau on Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Memorial Day). Chapnik said "[we] proved that Hitler and the Nazis were not successful and we proved that Am Yisrael Chai."

He credited the success of the March to the close bonds between teens, chaperones and survivors like Bob Weiss, Irving Eisner and Martha Shem-Tov who accompanied them. "The group will never forget the stories they told us."

Judith Peranson, a Grade 10 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said the March was relevant to everyone. "We could and did all make our own special meaning from our experiences."

But Rachel Spitzer, a Grade 13 student at University of Toronto Schools (UTS), said the March didn't answer her questions about the Holocaust.

"I still do not know why or how it happened and the number six million has become no easier to understand. If anything, I returned with more questions than ever before."

The 1994 March of the Living was co-ordinated by Chaia Berkowitz, associate director of Judaic Cultural Development at the Jewish Community Centre. Her co-chairs were Hilda Cohen and Ralph Shedlestky.

Rabbi Dratch said he was impressed by the teens. On the Yom Hashoah march to Birkenau, "I found mature, caring, inquisitive and committed young adults who are passionately concerned about Judaism and the Jewish people," he told The CJN.

"This really was a march of the living."

German doctors' abuse of power helped to boost Nazi doctrines

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Auschwitz-Birkenau camp doctor Joseph Mengele was taught to view his victims as "useless eaters" by the 1930s German medical profession, says a medical researcher and physician.

"The doctors made it possible, the doctors made it acceptable," said Dr. William Seidelman. "The doctors had the power."

Seidelman, a family physician, was lecturing on Nazi medicine to 45 doctors and medical ethicisits at the University of Toronto last month. The hour-long lecture and slide presentation was sponsored by the medical school's Department of Family and Community Medicine.

Seidelman said German doctors flocked to join the Nazi party — outnumbering all other professions three to one — and quickly came to embrace the notion of racial purity.

Letters from 1930s Berlin published at that time in the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) outlined the steps taken by the German medical community to ensure its goal of volksgesundheit (population health).

To cull the weak-minded, the schizophrenic, the manic depressive and the epileptic, German doctors performed 56,244 sterilizations in 1934. Teachers were encouraged to report poor students as candidates for sterilization: Seidelman estimates that 500,000 people were sterilized before the end of the war.

Race too became a medical diagnosis, and professorships in rassenhygien (race hygiene) were established at 10 universities by 1936. All of these developments were reported in JAMA up to 1941.

"The Holocaust involved . . . doctors and patients, not just Jews and gypsies," Seidelman said. "It was about power and the abuse of power."

German doctors abused their power, Seidelman said, in deciding whose life was of value. He urged his audience not to make the same judgments.

"Who are we to judge the quality of someone's life?" he asked. "We [as doctors] must pause and reassess those we consider unworthy . . . and affirm our own vulnerability, humanity and fallibility."

Doctors continued the abuse in gathering research subjects, said Seidelman. Mengele's grant for twin studies at Auschwitz-Birkenau was awarded after peer review. Seidelman showed how asylum residents were starved, overdosed and gassed beginning in late 1940, their remains dissected and sent to places like the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute of Brain Research (now the Max Planck Institute).

Specimens were also collected from PoWs killed by the Gestapo and from Jews felled by typhus in the Warsaw ghetto, Seidelman said.

For years the Hitler-era collections were used for neurological and neuropathological research. The Nazi specimens at the Max Planck Institute were finally buried in two graves in 1990 under a headstone reading:

"Science which did not respect their rights and dignity during life sought even to use their bodies after death. Be this stone a reminder to the living."

Seidelman, 53, studied the legacy of Nazi medicine in Germany in 1991 under the German Foreign Office. He will join U of T's Department of Family and Community Medicine from his current position at McMaster University in Hamilton in July, when he becomes medical director of the HIV Ambulatory Care Program at the Wellesley Hospital in downtown Toronto.

Sephardi convention expected to attract over 300 young people

TORONTO — Sephardi young people from all over North America are set to arrive this month for the sixth annual Sephard international convention.

The convention, organized by the Sephardic Educational Centre (SEC) in Los Angeles, is expected to attract over 300 people to the airport Ramada International Hotel May 27 to 30.

Conventioneers, aged 18 to 30, will celebrate Shabbat in the Sephardi Moroccan tradition, dance the night away at the Top of Toronto nightclub in the CN Tower, and take part in sessions on the Mideast peace process, the power of prayer and science and Judaism. Rabbi Benito Garcon from Madrid will address a community-sponsored breakfast on the Sunday morning. All food is under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto.

"The Sepharad is meant to bring people together to have fun, and also to experience different aspects of Judaism," said Jeff Belne, 26, president of the SEC Toronto chapter. Belne, an Ashkenazi, has attended three SEC conventions with his Sephardi wife, Donna. "You go to one, you come back for more."

Registration for Sepharad 1994 has begun. The $295 fee does not include air fare. For more information, contact Belne at (416) 636-5460 in Toronto, or Avi Bendayan at (514) 735-5565 in Montreal.

Nation of Islam speaker addresses group in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While Khalid Abdul Muhammad had to resort to using a telephone to deliver an anti-white and anti-Semitic diatribe to a Toronto audience this month [CJN, May 5], another aide to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan found the road across the Canadian border a lot more negotiable.

According to a brief news report in the Gazette [April 29], a man identified as a "lieutenant" to Farrakhan, Minister Lynwood X, delivered a "fiery" address to an "appreciative crowd" on April 28 at the Association universelle pour la promotion des noirs on Notre Dame Street West.

The report said that Lynwood X, who lives in Albany, N.Y., spent over an hour addressing a receptive audience of 90 people, and referred to Caucasians as "the skunks of the earth."

He was also quoted as saying, "A cracker is a cracker, whether he's in the United States or up here in Canada."

The report did not indicate whether he made any references to Jews.

The visit apparently caught local Jewish organizations off guard.

"They got us this time," admitted David Sultan, a policy consultant for Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q). "We don't even know who he is."

Yechiel Glustein, director of B'nai Brith Canada's office for eastern Canada, also said his organization had no advance knowledge of Lynwood X's visit.

"We never got any forewarning about it," he said. "No information at all."

Sultan and Glustein suggested one of the reasons their organizations were uninformed about Lynwood X may have been that their officials had turned their attention to the planned appearance in Toronto of Muhammad, which was scheduled to take place that weekend (April 30).

Sultan said if Congress had known in advance about the visit by Lynwood X, it would have checked his background and examined whether there was cause to block his appearance.

'Reject message outright'

That, however, might have been very difficult "because you need solid grounds," he said.

Glustein said B'nai Brith "certainly would have alerted the proper authorities" to monitor Lynwood X's speech.

Sultan and Glustein both indicated their organizations would look into the circumstances surrounding Lynwood X's visit.

According to Prof. Stephen Scheinberg, however, Lynwood X has been to Montreal on at least one previous occasion.

Scheinberg, who teaches at Concordia University, recalled that Lynwood X took part in a panel discussion about two months ago at the university.

At that time, he recalled, he was identified only as a Black Muslim minister.

Scheinberg speculated that because of Albany's proximity to Montreal, Lynwood X could turn out to be a more frequent visitor to Canada if Muhammad can no longer get in.

"It behooves us to check it out," he said.

In the view of Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of CJC-Q's executive committee, "It is tragic that anyone would give a platform" to a representative from the Nation of Islam, which "spews a clear and well-documented hatred against Jews, whites and homosexuals.

Rabbi Poupko said Lynwood X's speech "should have been monitored by legal authorities," to see whether it broke any of Canada's laws against promoting hatred or inciting violence.

A strongly-worded editorial published in the Gazette [May 3] charged that "the disciples of Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan are trying to make inroads into Canada.

"Canadians should recognize the group for what it is — a vehicle for spreading hatred — and reject its message outright...

"Racism is racism is racism. Nothing justifies it, in Canada or anywhere."

CJC plenary think tank explores Quebec's future

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

This article first appeared in the Montreal edition of The CJN (April 28) in French.

MONTREAL — Visions of Quebec: National Unity Versus Separation was the central theme of one of several think tanks at the recent Canadian Jewish Congress-Quebec region plenary.

Panelists were Pierre Fournier, vice-president and director of research for the investment firm Levesque and Beaubien; Josee Legault, political analyst and lecturer at the Universite du Quebec a Montreal; and John McCallum, dean of the Faculty of Arts of McGill University. Senator Gerald Beaudoin was panel moderator.

According to Fournier, the Parti Quebecois (PQ) has a very strong chance of winning the next election.

"The latest polls are categorical and very eloquent as to the chances of the Pequistes' forming the next government," he noted. "They could take between 80 and 90 of the 125 seats in the National Assembly... In the last decade, virtually no [western] government has been able to survive after two consecutive mandates."

Fournier is convinced that the current rather gloomy state of the economy may noticeably tarnish the credibility of the government of Quebec Premier Daniel Johnson. If the Liberal team wants to regain the high ground, he added, it will certainly have to inject new blood into its ranks. "About a third of their cabinet ministers have already resigned or intend to do so in the weeks to come. [PQ leader Jacques] Parizeau and Johnson are weak, not especially charismatic leaders. For this reason, the choice of a team will be very important."

According to Fournier, if the PQ comes out on top in the next election, the referendum on Quebec's political future should be held by June 24, 1995 at the latest. But, he added, the sovereigntists may well lose.

"On the other hand," he noted, "the results may be very different from those of the 1980 referendum. The vote will probably be very close. This time, the Liberals will hold far fewer cards. They will no longer find it easy to argue that federalism is renewable. Moreover, the involvement of Lucien Bouchard in the referendum campaign may also make life more difficult for them." Fournier feels that debates about Quebec's political future will take place in "a calm climate of tolerance."

Legault outlined the current state of relations between the francophone majority and the anglo-Quebec minority. According to Legault, instituting an open, constructive dialogue with the members of the anglo-Quebec minority is a major priority for sovereigntists working within the ranks of the PQ and the Bloc Quebecois.

"However," she added, "anglophones who try to become reconciled with the PQ often lose credibility in the eyes of their community. This is very frustrating."

But despite all the linguistic and ideological obstacles, a dialogue, still somewhat tentative, is gradually getting started. "There have been a series of encouraging, salutary initiatives begun by anglophone groups and institutions, which are beginning to bear fruit," she said.

McCallum, the author of several studies on the possible future socio-economic impact of sovereignty, was much more pessimistic and did not mince words.

He said the spirit of tolerance to which Fournier and Legault referred "could be severely tested in the pre-referendum period, because animosity and desire for revenge might get the upper hand.

"It is true that there are many sympathetic and friendly people involved in the PQ," he said. "But the party also shelters a lot of sovereigntists who don't like the anglophones — for example, Camille Laurin and Jean Campeau. In my opinion, we should mistrust that spirit of tolerance you just referred to. That sense of openness could take quite a beating in the next 12 months."

According to McCallum, Parizeau is deluding Quebecers, particularly when he says the cost of sovereignty will be nil or virtually insignificant. "That's false," he said. "The price to be paid will be substantial."

McCallum is convinced that sovereignty will have a highly negative impact on the economy of Quebec. It will lead to a new massive exodus of established Quebec businesses; discontent among the native peoples who will not accept the idea of being "transferred" from one country to another; a major economic crisis which will hit Quebec farmers and francophone federal employees in Hull with full force; ... pressure which will result in a lower Canadian dollar."

Also, at the monetary and fiscal level, he said, the repercussions might well be devastating for both Quebec and Canada."

JIAS asks minister to stay deportations of Russian families

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thirty to 40 Russian Jewish families are facing deportation from Canada, but the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) is asking Minister of Immigration and Employment Sergio Marchi to stay the orders on humanitarian grounds.

It is now much more difficult for Russian Jews to gain status as convention refugees "as there is an impression that state anti-Semitism in Russia no longer exists since Boris Yeltsin took over," Perry Romberg, executive director, JIAS Toronto, told The CJN.

But the prospects for continuing immigration from Russian Jews are good because under new government policy, their high educational status will improve their chances of being admitted, Romberg said.

In fact, Toronto has received 1,500 Russian Jews a year for the past three years, and there is every indication that this will continue or even increase with a good economy, family reunification, and the high skills of the immigrants, he said. A total of 8,500 Russian Jews have come to Canada since late 1987.

Even those Russian Jews who are sent back to Moscow, if the minister does not stay their deportation, can reapply under the new point system and a few families have already been readmitted to Canada, the JIAS director said.

The deportation of Russian Jews after they have lived in Canada for several years was raised at a forum on immigration at the Bernard Betel Centre May 4 by an audience member who said it was unfair to them because conditions for Jews in Russia have worsened recently.

No decision

No comment on the question was made by panel member Phillip Pirie, acting director general of the Immigration Department's Ontario region.

Romberg said the minister has not yet made a decision on the deportation cases. They have the option of going to Israel, he pointed out.

The CJN last week had a story about the family of Felix Gogniev and his family being deported to Russia, even though they come from North Ossetia, a region of tribal warfare where the Gognievs claim they were tortured.

Every avenue of appeal appears to have been exhausted in the Gogniev case, Romberg said.

Immigrants to Ontario are not as fairly treated by the federal government as in other provinces, the forum was told by Shelly Birnbaum of the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship. The average grant by the federal government to Ontario immmigrants is $764, compared with $1,500 in the rest of Canada, and $2,300 in Quebec, she said.

While Ontario gets 60 per cent of the immigrants, it gets only 39 per cent of the funding.

Romberg said Canada has done a reasonably good job on immigration policy, but there is room for improvement.

Instead of admitting 250,000 immigrants, Canada should cut the figure to from 150,000 to 185,000, Gord Johnson of the Reform Party said, because this is all the economy can absorb at this time. He denied that his party is against immigration.

Professor William H. Angus of the Osgoode Hall Law School, said Ontario should be more insistent on its rights under the selection process and more aggressive in recovering money from Ottawa for immigrants.

Na'amat takes aim at ending domestic violence in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Ilanit" was a fairly successful career woman in Israel. For 20 years she worked in a bank and had authority over a number of employees. Yet when she returned home, her husband would take her wages and invest them in businesses that failed. Things got so bad that court officials seized the couple's furniture.

"Rachel" was the daughter of a highly-respected rabbi. Her husband, who did not come from such a prestigious family, often criticized Rachel for her appearance and beat her almost from the first day of marriage. For two years she did not speak to her parents, to demonstrate to her husband that he had become the most important part of her life. She felt she could not go to her community for fear that they'd blame her and accuse her of not being a good wife.

"Sarah" was a university lecturer who married an engineer. She had no inkling of her husband's violent side until he smashed a mirror in their hotel suite on their wedding night. She left him and they were divorced shortly afterwards.

Besides suffering emotional and/or physical abuse in their relationships, all three women share another factor as well. All sought counselling and support at one of Na'amat's Family Violence Clinics in Israel, said Ronit Lev Ari, director of the centres.

As their stories would suggest, Na'amat counsels women from a wide variety of backgrounds.

Lev Ari was in Canada recently on a two-week visit to meet with Na'amat members and give them first-hand accounts of the work done by the social service organization in Israel. She was also laying the groundwork for a $400,000 fundraising campaign to go towards construction of a new women's shelter and counselling centre in Tel Aviv. The local municipality has promised to match the funds raised by Na'amat.

Ronit Lev Ari

"For me it's important to make people aware of the problem of violence against women in Israel," she said.

Lev Ari said the new Na'amat facility, which is slated to open in two to three years, will shelter women who face domestic violence as well as serve as a counselling centre for them and for walk-in clients. It will supplement the work done at five other shelters in the country.

Israelis are increasingly becoming aware of the problem of domestic violence and have taken steps to address the issue ever since the first shelter opened in Haifa in 1975, she said.

"Na'amat is the main address in Israel for this issue," said Lev Ari, adding that other organizations and government too have taken on more responsibility in treating the problem.

In addition, in June 1992, the Knesset passed the Law for the Prevention of Violence in the Family, which makes it easier to force a violent husband to leave the home.

Passage of the law also heightened public awareness of the problem and led some men to recognize their responsibility in creating the problem, she said.

Na'amat's four centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Beersheva counsel 150 men each year, and receive about 5,000 telephone calls from men and women seeking help. More than 3,000 women come into the centres each year for legal advice and counselling, Lev Ari said.

Lev Ari believes that domestic violence affects all sectors of society, whether Ashkenazi or Sephardi, observant or secular, rich or poor.

Eleven years ago when she first became interested in the field of domestic violence, Lev Ari found that three main factors came into play: The abusive husband usually came from an abusive family; 50 per cent of abused women married because they were pregnant; and there was an imbalance in economic resources. Paradoxically, it was in families where the woman brought more education and greater financial resources into the marriage and was from a higher status family that the abuse took place, she said.

Na'amat has published a brochure, entitled Signs Before the Battering, as part of its education program for female army recruits, to help women spot an abusive relationship in its early stages.

It points out that even during dating there can be hints. If he shows signs of jealousy, of a patronizing attitude, of a desire for control through such mundane matters as telling his partner when and how to cut her hair and by treating her as if she was his property, then these can be danger signs of pending emotional abuse, Lev Ari believes.

The booklet is part of a Na'amat effort to educate women so they are assertive enough to resist these pressures, enhance their self-image and not blame themselves if something goes wrong in the relationship, she added.

Students rally for Israeli MIAs

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — It was a birthday gift for missing Israeli paratrooper Ron Arad.

On May 5, the day Arad turned 36, five bus loads of Montreal high school students travelled to Parliament Hill to protest the long imprisonment of Arad and three other Israeli soldiers who disappeared while fighting in Lebanon.

The rally was co-sponsored by the Shaar Hashomayim youth group IMPRINT, the national Israel affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee in Quebec. The students, who came from several Montreal high-schools, were also joined by a dozen Ottawa teenagers.

Arad was captured in 1986 after parachuting from his airplane over Lebanon. Three years later, his captors turned him over to the Iranian Revolutionary Guards. No one has heard from him since, but protesters said they believe he is alive.

The other three soldiers, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz were taken prisoner during a tank battle with Syrian forces in 1982. Several eye witnesses later claimed to have seen them being paraded on their captured tank through the streets of Damascus, Syria. There has been no word about them either.

At the rally, the students sang Hebrew songs, waved placards and Israeli flags and shouted slogans asking for the soldiers' freedom. Then they boarded their buses and headed for the Iranian embassy several blocks away.

Stationed across the street from the embassy, they continued to sing while Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress-Quebec region executive, tried unsuccessfully to deliver a petition to embassy officials. He was turned away at the door.

Rabbi Poupko told students at the rally that Israel has repeatedly released Palestinian prisoners. Most recently, as part of the limited self-rule agreement for Jericho and Gaza signed in Cairo last week, the Israeli government agreed to free 5000 Palestinian prisoners.

"[Yet] there is no attempt by the other side to say, now that things have changed, now that the alleged waves of peace are sweeping over Israel and the Middle East, now is the time . . . when Ron Arad should finally be returned to his wife and his young daughter," Rabbi Poupko said.

He said he believes the soldiers are alive and are being held in Lebanon with the support of the Syrian or Iranian governments. However, in violation of the terms of the Geneva Convention, no humanitarian group, such as the International Red Cross, has been allowed to see them and they have not received any mail.

Eve Sultan, leader the IMPRINT youth group, said so many students had turned up for the rally that organizers had to hire an extra bus at the last minute. She said many of the students met Arad's wife Tami and daughter Yuval when they came to Montreal in October and were touched by their story.

"I've been working with youth a long time and for such an issue I've never seen such a huge turnout," she said.

Jason Crelinsten, a 14-year-old student at Lower Canada College, said students organized the rally because they thought a demonstration would be an effective way to raise awareness about the MiAs. He stressed that the soldiers' plight was not just a concern for Jews or young people.

"I find it amazing that people can categorize issues, like it's a Jewish humanitarian issue or it's some other kind of humanitarian issue . . . They're human and therefore it's a humanitarian issue and that's all that should make sense."

Jewish 'hams' set to flood New York

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hams will be having an eyeball June 10 to 13 at the Fallsview Hotel in Ellenville, N.Y.

If this has you puzzled, hams — guaranteed kosher! — are amateur radio operators, Jewish ones in this case, and an "eyeball" is a get-together.

The Jewish hams belong to International Chaverim. Once a year they like to meet face to face instead of just chatting over the air waves.

International Chaverim has 21 chapters in the United States and Canada, with chapters in Brazil, England, France and Israel, says Hamilton radio operator Yaacov Goldberg.

"It is not unusual for us to speak to people in Belize, Quito, Ecuador, Miami, California, Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton and many places in between."

The Chaverim meet daily on radio between 7:30 a.m. and 8:30 a.m. and Sundays from 7:30 a.m. to 9:30 a.m. at 14326 megacycles.

As well, the Canadian chapter meets every Thursday evening at 9 p.m. local time on 3759 megacycles.

So if any Jewish hams out there would like to join an eyeball with fellow amateur radio enthusiasts, they'll be more than welcome Friday to Monday, June 10 to 13, at the Fallsview Hotel in the Catskills.

Keren Hayesod executive helps to launch new UIA division

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jerusalem resident Shlomo Pollack has probably seen more of small town Canada than have most Canadians.

The Keren Hayesod executive recently returned from a visit to the tiny community of Spring Hill, in Nova Scotia's Annapolis Valley, made famous by hometown singer Anne Murray.

While in the Maritime province, Pollack also spent time in Sydney, Glace Bay and Halifax before moving on to Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal.

No stranger to Jewish communities off the beaten track, Pollack has also visited Jews in Singapore, Auckland, New Zealand, Perth, Australia and Bloemfontein, in South Africa's Orange Free State.

It's all in a day's work for Pollack, the international director of the legacy department of the Keren Hayesod, the agency that transmits funds raised in the Diaspora (excluding the United States) to the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Pollack's recent visit to Canada was in part to help launch the United Israel Appeal's (UIA) new wills and bequests department and to help train UIA employees about that delicate subject.

Barney Harris, national field director for UIA, said "we see this as a natural extension of our work."

In addition to transferring funds raised by the country's 10 federated communities to Israel through Keren Hayesod, the UIA also runs its own annual campaigns in areas of the country that are unfederated. That includes communities in the Atlantic provinces, Regina, North Battleford, Sault Ste. Marie, Victoria, St. Catharines and elsewhere. Altogether, 5,000 contributors in 54 unfederated communities raised around $2.5 million last year, Harris said.

Shlomo Pollack

But based on UIA experience elsewhere, Pollack and the UIA believe that Jews in smaller centres are more than willing to leave their capital assets to Israel as well.

That's where the UIA's new wills and bequests department comes in. Pollack is spreading the word among potential contributors and professionals such as lawyers and accountants who deal with those planning their estates that they might consider leaving a percentage of their assets to Israel.

Hence the trip to Spring Hill.

Pollack, a native of Montreal who made aliyah in 1970, said the UIA has found that at least 50 per cent of those who make a bequest for Israel are not regular campaign contributors. Others often give only small sums in the yearly campaign but have been known to leave 20 to 30 times as much in their wills.

Many are middle class, elderly people who in their later years live on a fixed income, Pollack said. As they get older, they worry about maintaining their capital to ensure a comfortable lifestyle. As a result, their contributions to the annual campaign may drop, but their desire to help Israel remains.

That is reflected in the astounding figures that Pollack cites. Although "we're dealing with a portfolio of 1,500 commitments around the world," in 1993 bequests accounted for 22 per cent of the total world cash transfers to Israel (exluding the United States), he said.

Pollack said the wills and bequests department looks for a broad base of people who will make contributions, whether $1,000 or $1 million. Canada is seen as an "untapped" area.

Harris said the UIA is in the process of setting up a committee to serve the unfederated Canadian communities while publicizing the way friends of Israel can leave a lasting legacy after they've gone.

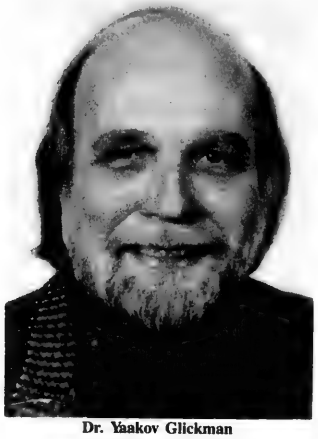
Russian Jews: a group unto themselves?

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Have the 22,000 Russian Jews who have come to Canada's shores in the last decade changed the Canadian Jewish community for better or worse?

It's an intriguing question and it's dealt with rather gingerly by an Israeli-born and educated sociologist who has studied the Russian Jewish community in Toronto.

"It may be premature to answer that question," says Dr. Yaacov Glickman, formerly a professor at the University of Toronto, a specialist in the study of the sociology of contemporary Jewry in Canada and the United States. "Let's say that at the moment I have a feeling of creative ambivalence about it."



Dr. Yaakov Glickman

Glickman's research showed that most of the immigrants lived in their own enclaves, relied on friends and relatives to find them housing and work instead of on Jewish organizations or government bodies, and sent their children to public schools instead of Jewish day schools in most cases. They expressed optimism about their future in Canada (9 out of 10 want to stay in Canada). Finally, according to his research, most did not have strong Jewish identification.

In an interview with The CJN he stated flatly that the apparent schism between the Russian Jews and mainstream Jewish organizations is of a "potentially serious nature, if it is not addressed."

This is one of the reasons he hopes that his pilot study of a comparatively small number of Russian Jews in Toronto will be expanded into a larger project and he says planning for such a project is underway. Though his study was done in 1991, he has done an updated report for its sponsors and he says that in the main the findings still hold true today.

His study was supported by the federal departments of Employment and Immigration and External (now Foreign) Affairs; the Centre for Refugee Studies, York University; Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS); and the Institute of Sociology, Soviet Academy of Sciences, Moscow. Professor Robert Brym, of the University of Toronto, was an advisor.

To the question, "Is there anything wrong with the Russian Jews living in their own enclaves?" Glickman replied: "There is nothing wrong. It is only wrong if it deepens the schism we're talking about. We can't force integration down their throats."

"...the Toronto-based community of Soviet Jewish immigrants appear to have posed both a promise and an acute dilemma to mainstream Jewish life in Canada," the report says.

Another of Glickman's findings was that most do not trust a socialist political party (they are not NDP supporters) and they tend to vote in any election like the majority of Canadians do. They consider maintaining the Russian language and culture high on the scale of priorities and the need for Hebrew or Yiddish very low.

Despite these negative points, Glickman says there is the possibility that the Russian Jews will strengthen the total Jewish community in Canada. "...the emigres may be expected to somewhat tilt the demographic balance of an aging and intermarrying population in a more favorable direction," the report says. It is also his feeling that the Canadian Jewish community, having survived various crises in the past, will face up to the apparent schism between the Russian Jews and the general community, and come out stronger in the end.

On this point, his report says: "Surely the Russian Jews do not fit, not at the present moment at any rate, into this optimistic scenario (neither do other fringe groups such as the Israelis currently living in Canada, the young, the working-class and the poor, the academicians, North African (Sephardic) Jews, and women). They still might as time goes on. The die has not yet been cast and the alternatives are still wide open for individual choice and human initiative."

Glickman thinks the Russian Jews in the United States and Israel live generally in the same way as they do in Toronto, keeping to their own friendships and enclave networks.

On the point often raised that Russian Jews should go to Israel, not Canada or the United States, Glickman says he understands the need of Israel for immigrants but he believes it is important that all emigrant Jews be given a wide open range of choice.

The author dealt at length with the general community versus immigrant issue because a previous study by Roberta L. Markus and Donald V. Schwartz in 1978, published in 1984, showed a serious alienation of Russian Jews in Canada.

As to the number of Russian Jews expected in Canada in the future, Glickman says it is now more difficult for them to enter because of changed immigration rules. "The Jews of the former Soviet Union, prominent on the political agenda just a few years ago, have been relegated, for the time being at least, to a secondary position on the priority ladder."

On the other hand, he writes, the dangers to Jews in the former Soviet Union are ever present in a chaotic situation and out-migration of Jews may increase. It would be prudent for authorities to plan ahead for increasing numbers, he says.

He explores an interesting reason for the differences between the Russian Jews and the older Jewish community. He says the latter came to Canada with "cultural baggage" far different from that brought by the Russian migrants. In one case, the baggage was steeped in their shtetl life and religious identification, while the latter, after the Russian revolution, had no rich Jewish baggage but a Slavic cultural baggage of their own.

The Russian Jews have brought a dash of color to Toronto life and certainly strengthened its musical resources, Glickman notes. He recounted the story of the Russian Jewish immigrant coming down the ramp of a plane without a bulky musical instrument, and a bystander commenting, "Oh, he must be a pianist."

Glickman is not unprepared for swift reaction to his report, particularly because it contains the following paragraph: "The emigres cared little or not at all about Jewish religion, tended not to participate in Jewish communal activities, preferred, mostly for pragmatic (socio-economic) reasons, the public over the Jewish school system, were in the main non-observant (there were interesting exceptions to this rule) spoke mostly Russian at home, and although clustering in predominantly Jewish residential neighborhoods, formed friendship networks consisting primarily of fellow Soviet Jews."

Not so, say those involved

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Are Russian Jews estranged from the organized Jewish community in Toronto as one researcher claims? (See related story)

The answer is no, in the opinion of two people who are highly involved with Russian Jews.

"We had 5,000 people at our last High Holy Day services," said Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, executive director of the Russian Jewish Community Centre.

A total of 420 Russian Jews (140 families) sat down with other Jews at seders last Passover and 200 are attending English classes said Marsha Slavens, co-chair with Susan Goldberg of the Community Integration Program (CIP) of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

There were 200 at a Purim party and another 200 at a Chanukah party, and an-all Russian chapter of B'nai Brith Youth has just been formed, Slavens said.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman

Rabbi Zaltzman claims that the percentage of Russian Jews attending religious services is higher in his community than in the general community. In addition, he says the 2,953 families who contributed $550,000 to the centre last year, out of a total centre membership of 5,000, represents a greater commitment to charity than is shown in the community at large. "Not bad for an immigrant community that has been persecuted for seven decades," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

In his opinion, researcher Dr. Yaacov Glickman need be under no illusion about whether the influx of Russian Jews has weakened or strengthened the Canadian Jewish community as a whole. "He is wrong if he does not realize that we are a great asset to the community. There is no split between us."

Slavens points to the family-to-family and telephone-link projects of CIP to show how closely involved the organized community is in making the newcomers feel welcome. Sometimes it is forgotten that the Russians came from a country where the organized community meant communism and this may be why some are reluctant to join the mainstream, she added.

"Remember, too, that the CIP has been going only for five or six years, and in the early days of the Russian influx they were not as welcomed into Canadian homes as they are today. One told me that he had lived in Toronto for 20 years without being invited into a Canadian home. Our program may not have all the answers but it is bringing greater involvement."

For his part, Rabbi Zaltzman believes the general community is doing quite a good job in integrating the Russian newcomers and suggests that the key for even greater success lies in a program of more vigorous Jewish education for youth.

"I don't see integration as a serious problem. By nature and background our people feel closer to their own. Integration is a normal process and it takes time."

A total of 1,800 circumcisions have been performed in the last 10 years under the centre's auspices, he said, including one on a man of 68.

The seders at which Russian Jews are guests have brought a stream of letters to the CIP expressing thanks. The most memorable moment for Slavens at one of these seders came when a 70-year-old Russian who had never heard Hebrew since he was a boy in his grandfather's house, recited the four questions at the seder in Toronto.

With the help of the Jewish Women's Federation and other groups, tours of the high spots of Toronto for Russian Jews have been organized and well attended. The high level of education among the newcomers has resulted in their taking advantage of the city's considerable cultural resources.

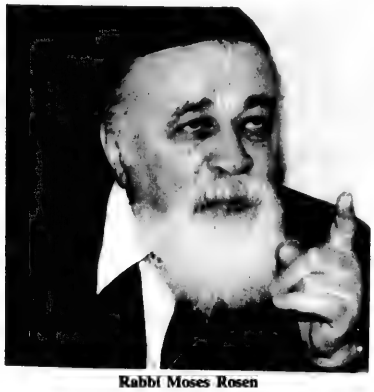
In the world of music and dance, the Russian Jews shine and one of the CIP's projects sees private homes opened to concerts by these musicians who are paid for their performances by the guests.

Rabbi Zaltzman said he ran into some opposition when he announced a plan to open a new synagogue for the Russians on the grounds that it would deter integration. "But you can't have integration until the partners are comfortable with each other; and our plan has proved successful because not only are we getting more and more people to services but some of our members are now joining other synagogues closer to their homes."

The Russian Jews have formed their own group to solicit funds for the United Jewish Appeal, Slavens said.

These Russian Jewish children, recent immigrants to Toronto, are hosted at a party at the National Council of Jewish Women arranged by the active Community Integation Plan of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Rabbi Rosen was tireless worker for Romanian Jews



Rabbi Moses Rosen

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

IASI, Romania — Romanian Chief Rabbi Moses Rosen, the leading figure in the postwar Jewish community here, died in Bucharest last Friday after suffering two strokes in April.

Rabbi Rosen was 81. His body was flown to Jerusalem for burial.

News of his death stunned the diminishing Romanian Jewish community, whose members had hoped and prayed for the rabbi's recovery.

Jewish leaders from New York to Jerusalem were quick to express their praise for Rosen, a figure who tirelessly struggled with the Communist leaders in Romania on behalf of the country's Jewish community.

Rabbi Rosen, who had been chief rabbi of Romania since 1948, wielded an extraordinary amount of influence within that country as a religious leader and a frequent envoy to the United States on behalf of Romania.

He enabled nearly the entire postwar Jewish community of Romania, about 400,000, to emigrate and settle in Israel. The exodus was unique in Communist Eastern Europe.

Before World War II, there were approximately 800,000 Romanian Jews. But that number was cut in half during the Holocaust.

There are now only some 18,000 Jews, most of them elderly, living among Romania's 23 million people.

Rabbi Rosen maintained an astoundingly strong Jewish religious and cultural life throughout Romania with the extensive help of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, providing Jews who remained, even in the most isolated communities, with kosher food, religious life and quality care for the elderly.

Rabbi Rosen was sometimes subjected to criticism for channeling money to Romania's Communist regime in exchange for providing the country's Jews with exit visas. But he remained steadfast in his efforts to secure safe passage for the country's Jews to Israel.

In the years following the violent fall of dictator Nicolae Ceausescu in 1989, Rabbi Rosen fought against a resurgence of Romanian anti-Semitism when many in the country sought a scapegoat for economic woes.

Rabbi Rosen was born in 1912, in Moinesti, Moldavia, where his father was the local rabbi.

He recalled in his autobiography that "though small, this community became famous in the history of the rebuilding, because it was from Moinesti that the first Romanian Jewish settlers left for Palestine in 1882."

The group was known as the Hovevei Zion, the "Lovers of Zion."

He was sometimes criticized as a "Jewish pope" because of his flowing purple and black robes, his tall, mitered hat and a California-size Magen David worn around his neck.

But there was method to the man.

In presenting himself to the Romanian public as a high religious figure, he earned the respect given to Christian Orthodox figures in a country where physical trappings meant much. And in so doing, he enabled the small Jewish population to be accorded a measure of respect and protection it desperately needed.

Bar-Lev served as Israeli ambassador

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Haim Bar-Lev, eighth chief of staff of the Israel Defence Force and most recently Israel's ambassador to Moscow, was laid to rest Sunday after succumbing to what was described as heart failure Saturday at a Tel Aviv hospital.

"He was a noble knight," Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said in saluting Bar-Lev at the funeral.

Retired Gen. Shlomo Gazit called him "one of nature's real gentlemen."

Although Bar-Lev's funeral was held with full military honors, his old friends from the former IDF senior command left their medals at home as they said farewell, in keeping with the egalitarian tradition of the Palmach, the strike force of the pre-state Jewish army.

Bar-Lev's name became synonymous with a line of fortifications at the Suez Canal built under his command when he was Israel Defence Force chief of staff from 1968 to 1971.

A member of the Labor Party and an advocate of compromise with the Arabs, Bar-Lev switched from military life to politics in 1972, but returned to active duty during the 1973 Yom Kippur War. It was during that war that the Bar-Lev Line was breached by Egyptian troops.

He was a member of Knesset from 1977 to 1990, serving on the foreign affairs and defence committees, and as chairman of the Knesset subcommittee on the defence budget. He also served as minister of commerce and industry and later as police minister.

Younger students frightened by swastikas

"This had all the trademarks of a hate crime," he said.

Summer has previously proved to be a more popular time for racist incidents, Kagedon said.

He said it is time for the federal government and judicial authorities to become more "aggressive" in combatting racism — by punishing perpetrators with sentences appropriate to hate crimes, by enacting educational programs, and by keeping "hate recruiters" off campuses.

Ben-Simon said her students, many of them young children, were frightened by the sight of the swastikas when they arrived at school.

She called an assembly and tried to reassure them that it was probably an isolated incident.

But she also told The CJN that the vandalism must have taken time because it was "too well done."

About four years ago, at its earlier location on Marcil Street, the school was daubed with one large swastika.

This incident, however, is much more serious, "bizarre," she said.

"I think it was Nazis," she said. "We didn't need this."

Rabin issues veiled critique of Arafat's brinkmanship

Riveting political theatre

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

CAIRO — PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat asked Israel to slow the pace of transition in Gaza-Jericho by "up to four weeks" to assure an orderly transfer to the new Palestinian Authority, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told reporters here last week.

He said that although Israel originally hoped to leave within 10 days, he would, albeit reluctantly, comply.

Rabin's remarks came at the end of a landmark day, which saw the signing the 200-page accord that signaled the first time Palestinians would be given control over their own lives.

However, the ceremony was marred by an embarrassingly visible confrontation over whether Arafat would sign the agreement's accompanying maps, which included a smaller Jericho area than he wanted.

An angry, red-faced Rabin threatened to halt the ceremony, and centre-stage pressures on Arafat from all sides were easily noticed by the 2,500 spectators in the hall and the millions watching live on television.

The ceremony was abruptly adjourned for a few minutes amid concern that the entire agreement could unravel.

Arafat eventually signed the maps, but added a lengthy proviso that the validity of his signature dependended on Rabin's agreement to an existing accompanying letter, which states Israel will discuss increasing the 62 sq. km. allotted to autonomous Jericho, along with a promise to settle differences over whether a Palestinian policeman would be stationed on the Allenby bridge and whether a Palestinian would run the Rafiah border crossing.

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid said the accompanying letter was more of a face-saving device, since Arafat knows that Israel cannot accede to PLO requests on the two letter issues, and can do precious little about expanding Jericho.

PLO spokesman Marwan Kanafani said it was unfair to blame Arafat, since it was known he did not like the proposed size of Jericho, and "he did not know that maps would be signed." Israeli officials disagreed, noting that the Palestinians participated fully in preparations for the ceremony.

Israeli officials charged Arafat brought brinkmanship to a new level, and a top Rabin aide called the spectacle a "disgrace."

In his remarks to reporters, Rabin played down what he called a "minor incident," and preferred to focus on the future.

"We could complete the handing over in two to three weeks, perhaps even in 10 days," he said. "The problem today, as the chairman of the PLO said last night, is that he might delay up to two, three, or four weeks. We would like to get out as quickly as possible."

While careful not to attack Arafat openly, Rabin did issue veiled criticism, suggesting the delay was due to the PLO's preoccupation with symbols, to the detriment of the nuts and bolts of governance.

The signing ceremony itself was originally designed to highlight Egypt's constructive role in the peace process, and thereby its leadership in the Arab world.

Speaker after speaker lauded Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak as a peacemaker, and wished him well on 65th birthday.

After a conciliatory speech by Mubarak on the need for Palestinians to put aside decades-old enmity and for Israelis to cooperate with Palestinians, it was time for both parties to sign the accord.

Arafat went first. He signed the three copies of the deal, which included security, civilian, economic, and legal annexes, then quickly thumbed through the six accompanied maps without signing.

When it was Rabin's turn to sign, Foreign Ministry legal adviser Yoel Singer whispered, "He didn't sign the maps." Rabin replied, "Then neither will I."

Returning to his place alongside Mubarak, Rabin complained about Arafat's refusal to sign. Using unmistakable body language, including shaking his head, he said he would not speak unless Arafat signed.

Using his own hand gestures of refusal, plus a stony-faced stance, Arafat refused. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa became involved, and both, along with Mubarak, motioned that Arafat must sign.

United States Secretary of State Warren Christopher stood alongside Arafat, awkward and motionless, only to become involved in talking with Mubarak and Arafat after calling his aide, Dennis Ross, to the podium.

Other Palestinians and Israelis were also called to the podium, as frenzied meetings went on during the speeches. With the public ignoring the speeches and riveted on the political theater, the ceremony was abruptly, but temporarily, halted.

Observers arrive in Hebron

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

HEBRON — A full contingent of international observers has arrived in this West Bank town, but on their first day of monitoring duties, found themselves caught in clashes between Palestinian protesters and Israeli soldiers.

The unarmed 114-member observer force, recruited from Norway, Denmark and Italy, arrived in Hebron on Sunday in a convoy led by the Israel Defence Force. They were accompanied by a busload of members of the foreign news media.

No sooner did they arrive than Palestinians protesting the presence of Jewish settlers in Hebron and nearby Kiryat Arba began throwing stones at Israeli soldiers.

The soldiers responded by firing tear gas into the crowd.

The observers, caught in the confrontation, soon found themselves choking on the tear gas.

"I guess we'll have to get used to carrying onions around with us," an Italian member of the observer force later said on Israel Radio, referring to one method to counter the effects of the gas.

Odd Wibe, the Norwegian coordinator of the team, said Israeli border policemen who drove towards the crowd of more than 1,000 well-wishers were at fault.

"We had an agreement that the army would keep away. It did not and this provoked children to throw stones. If they hadn't turned up it wouldn't have happened," he said.

The presence of observers, known officially as the Temporary International Presence in Hebron (TIPH) was agreed to by Israel and the PLO in late March following the Feb. 25 slaying of at least 30 Palestinians at a Hebron mosque by an Israeli settler.

The agreement on the presence of an international team of observers had paved the way for the resumption of Israeli-PLO negotiations, which the Palestinians had suspended immediately after the Hebron massacre.

The observers will be in place for an initial three-month period, a mandate that is renewable for additional three-month periods.

Greece to provide PLO light arms and uniforms

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ATHENS — Following through on a request from Yasser Arafat, the Greek government has agreed to supply light arms and uniforms to the newly-created Palestinian police force in the Gaza Strip and Jericho.

But Greece did not include heavy military equipment in its aid package.

Athens will give the PLO police uniforms and helmets, light vehicles and radar and a still undetermined number of rifles and handguns.

While agreeing to supply light arms, the Greek government has flatly rejected the idea of supplying other equipment to the Palestinians.

During a visit to Greece in November, Arafat had asked for armored vehicles, patrol boats, minesweepers and helicopters.

His request was forwarded to the Greek Foreign Ministry, which passed it on with a favorable recommendation to the Ministry of National Defence.

The Defence Ministry sent the request on to the army and navy chiefs of staff, who rejected it during a closed meeting last Dec. 4.

In declining the request, the military said that providing the assistance would sap Greece's military arsenal at a time of instability in the Balkans.

The military also noted that during the 1980s, Greece had supplied military equipment to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and to the Nicaraguan Sandinistas led by Daniel Ortega. In both cases, the military officials said, "the equipment was used in the wrong way, with no benefit to Greece."

Those favoring the PLO request pointed to the fact that the PLO has been recognized by the United States and Israel.

They added that fulfilling the request would help Greece influence Palestinians without jeopardizing its relations with Israel, said to have improved in recent years.

Earlier this year, Greece attempted to offer the Palestinians old military hardware, some of which dated back to World War II. The Palestinian leadership rejected it.

Soldiers say goodbye to Gaza

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

GAZA — Soldiers leaving Gaza through the Erez checkpoint did most of the celebrating last week, as Gazans remained somber throughout the signing of the agreement that handed them self-rule.

"Goodbye Gaza, I hope never to see you again," shouted one soldier on his way out. "Gaza belongs to you now, look after it," said another, handing back a taxi driver's documents and waving him through a roadblock.

Few Gazans expected an outburst of joy among the local residents. Residents debated whether the accord was a trick, a sellout or an opportunity. Few considered it a new dawn.

"They are handing us responsibilities but keeping the control," said a nurse at Shifa Hospital. "Gaza will just be a large prison."

"It is a black day, a disaster," said a young man leaving a barber shop. "I want to go back to Jaffa."

There was no indifference. The streets were half empty during the signing ceremony, as people were glued to their TV sets.

Allusions to the past seemed to dominate the conversations. Those who supported the agreement talked as though anything must be better than the present.

"What are we supposed to think? While Rabin was actually signing, a soldier shot a boy in the leg. We are still waiting to see what happens," said pharmacist Ihsan Ahmad. His shop is opposite the guard tower in the Jabalya refugee camp, whose future will be a litmus test of a successful peace agreeement.

Most installations handed over to the Palestinians

The officials said there have already been some joint Israeli-Palestinian patrols, which were undertaken in an effort to familiarize the Palestinians with the territory to come under their control.

According to the IDF officials, nearly all the police and security installations to be handed over to the Palestinians have already been evacuated of Israeli troops. All the remaining installations, the officials said, will be vacated by the end of this week.

In a separate development, the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement held a conference over the weekend at the Islamic University in Gaza to discuss the newly emerging situation in Gaza and Jericho.

Some of those attending the conference expressed fears that the Palestinian police would deal harshly with Islamic militants.

But the participants agreed that there should be no more bloodshed between Palestinian opponents and supporters of the peace process and that any arising disagreements should be settled in a democratic manner.

Rabbinical Reflections

Shavuot

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

From Pesach to Shavuot we count the 49 days of the Omer. The Jews in Egypt were influenced by the 49 stages of contamination that prevailed in that civilization and it required a full day to nullify the effects of each stage and replace them with the 49 stages of holiness in preparation for Kabbola HaTorah — Receiving the Torah on Mount Sinai.

The Talmud tells us how the great Master, Rabbenu HaKadosh, cried and exclaimed: "There are those who are fortunate enough to be able to acquire their World to Come in one single hour; there are those who take many years to do so." (Avodah Zarah 10b, 18a.)

I would like to devote this article to a way that can perhaps accomplish both of the above — helping one to rise through the 49 stages, and acquiring Olom HeBah in one hour.

I recognize the unpopular stance that will be taken; the scoffing and the ridicule; the criticisms of the oversimplifications. But let but one reader be influenced in some small way — and dayenu — I shall have done my job.

This article was inspired by the efforts of Rabbi Ephraim Applebaum, a rabbi at Eitz Chaim, who initiated the project among over 300 students as their preparation for Shavuot — Zeman Matan Toroseinu — the time of the giving of our Torah.

Rabbi Applebaum told the true story of a Kollel wife in Israel who supported her husband's Torah study by writing books. A freak mix-up by a computer repair shop erased three years' work from the hard drive of her computer. Having gone through that aggravation myself on a much smaller scale, I can vouch for the anguish and pain the couple suffered. Beside the financial loss incurred, there was the additional loss of time it took to reconstruct the years of work eradicated at the touch of a button.

Using this analogy, Rabbi Applebaum told our students we were doing the very same thing to ourselves. We were purposely pressing buttons that were instantaneously erasing years of Torah and mitzvah influence that were till now indelibly implanted in our psyches. The buttons? The TV buttons we press which flood our minds with the violence, filth, immorality, the spiritual, philosophical and cultural poisons, that perniciously attack any healthy Torah attitudes we have imbibed in our Torah schooling.

Various news articles tell us in San Diego "a high school honor student watches a lurid ABC-TV fictionalization of the 1890s Lizzie Borden axe murder case, then chops his own parents and sister to death and leaves his brother a quadriplegic."

In Denver, "The Deer Hunter is telecast and a 17-year-old kills himself with a revolver, acting out the movie's climactic game of Russian roulette. He is the 25th viewer in two years to kill himself that way after watching the drama on TV."

Then-U.S. Surgeon General Jesse L. Steinfeld declares "The casual relationship between televised violence and antisocial behavior is sufficient to warrant immediate remedial action."

A 1982 Nielsen Report on Television says the average American family keeps its television set on for 49½ hours a week. The typical youngster graduating from high school will have spent almost twice as much time in front of the tube as he has in the classroom — the staggering equivalent to 10 years of 40-hour weeks. (Eugene H. Methvin, Reader's Digest, January 1983.)

Challenging Marshall McLuhan's theory that television will create "a global village," Jo-An Claytor writes in the Globe and Mail Oct. 14, 1992, that "a house with a resident TV runs a very good chance of becoming a member of a global village of idiots." Syndicated columnist Ann Landers advises "Be firm. You wouldn't allow your child to eat garbage, would you? Why, then, let him put it in his head?" (Reader's Digest, January 1983).

The influence of television is written about in the Jewish press as well. "Television leaves a much deeper impression than reading a newspaper or a book does," writes Rabbi Simon Schwab in the Jewish Observer (February 1992). "Sitting in front of the screen, you no longer think for yourself; the thinking is done for you. You simply absorb, uncritically, whatever your eye see and your ears hear.

"Today how blind can one be not to realize that television is a wide-open window, letting into our homes the foul odor of the immoral and amoral atmosphere that prevails outside? The full range of idol-worship, immorality, and bloodshed have free entry into the Jewish home, and drive out the kedusha (sanctity)," writes Rabbi Schwab.

"So one just turns the knob a bit more, and is treated to a potpourri of murder, torture, sadistic violence, spilled blood — the whole ugliness of crime, with all horrid details graphically displayed.

"And then one turns the knob a little further. This time we are exposed to an explosion of promiscuity and licentiousness, normal and abnormal, the whole arsenal of the yetzer hora (the evil inclination) in full realistic color."

I am reminded how the great Maggid of Jerusalem, Rabbi Sholom Schwadron, described his introduction to TV. He was collecting money in England for charity with a friend. They came at night to a home cloaked in darkness. The friend insisted on ringing the bell. After some time Rabbi Schwadron peered through the uncurtained living room and noticed the room was dark and several people were sitting on the floor.

"Oy Vey," he said to his friend. "Don't disturb them. They must be sitting shivah. Look, it's dark and they're sitting on the floor. Let's go and leave them undisturbed in their mourning."

One of the first questions we are asked when we stand before the Heavenly Tribunal after 120 years is, "Kovaata itim l'Torah — did you set aside a set time each day to study Torah?" (Shabbos 31a). It would seem to me many more people would be able to answer in the affirmative to a slightly modified version of that question, "Kovaata itim l'Tee Vee?"

Our own experience at school has shown the wonderful new horizons that have opened to the children who throw out television or who at least are on a very strict diet of TV, closely supervised by their parents. (Some have even purchased the TV Allowance device that locks the TV after a child has watched his allotted time.)

They are more active in healthful physical activities and sports; they are more engaged in creative hobbies and intellectually stimulating games; they certainly discover the joys of reading good literature; there is less violence in the home; there is more communication between parents and children and between siblings.

No one wants to be labelled an exception, extremist or fanatic. But it seems to me that with honest discussion, a true recognition of the facts and with patience, diplomacy and courage, many of us can prepare in a very meaningful way for the oncoming Yom Tov of Shavuot.

Time is a most precious commodity. If we increase time we spend learning Torah (adults and children) by robbing that thief of time — television — we shall be regaining literally hundreds of thousands of hours otherwise squandered in a lifetime. Which question would you rather answer after 120 years? Chag Somayach!

The News in Brief

Immigration Down 22 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — Immigration to Israel fell 22 per cent in the first quarter of this year compared to the previous quarter, the government reported last week.

During the first three months of 1994, 16,400 immigrants arrived, compared to 20,900 immigrants in the previous quarter.

Immigration from the former Soviet Union dropped significantly, from 18,400 in the last quarter of 1993, to 14,000 in the first quarter, a 24 per cent decrease.

There was a slight drop in the number of immigrants from the rest of the world, the bureau reported.

There were 850 newcomers from Europe, excluding the former Soviet Union; 400 from Asia; 500 from Africa — half of those from Ethiopia; and 700 from North America, Australia and New Zealand.

PLO Won't Prevent Attacks on Israelis

JERUSALEM — Sufian Abu-Zaideh, a senior Fatah official, has been quoted in Ma'ariv as saying that the new PLO police force in Gaza and Jericho will not prevent attacks against Israelis outside the self-rule zone.

"Anyone who thinks the Palestinian police will try to prevent attacks outside the borders of the autonomous area is making a bitter mistake. Its role will be to protect the Palestinian people and to prevent attacks only in the autonomous areas," he was quoted as stating.

Ma'ariv has also reported that a bill requiring Israel to heed its agreement with the PLO only if the PLO amends its covenant was defeated last month.

Thus, the newspaper said, the PLO's covenant still calls for the destruction of the State of Israel.

Help For Agunot on Way?

JERUSALEM — Israel's treasury plans to provide money for a special rabbinical court to deal with agunot, or women refused a get (Jewish divorce), MK Naomi Chazan of the Meretz party said last week at the opening of the two-day conference of ICAR, the International Coalition of Agunot.

Chazan discussed legislation passed this year for women locked into marriages, and the help the Knesset status of women committee has had from both the Chief Rabbinate and the Ministry of Religious Affairs.

But she opened and closed her remarks with the same statement: "There will be no solution for agunot and women refused a get until there is a separation of church and state."

The major legal change this year for the 8,000 to 16,000 Israeli women refused a get is that they can now claim the same legal rights as the heads of single-parent families.

Israel at Qatar Talks

QATAR — Amid statements welcoming them to this Persian Gulf emirate, Israeli negotiators took their place among 37 other delegations for the start of multilateral talks on arms control held here last week.

"How good it is to see Israeli and Arab delegates sitting together here. It augurs well for peace," British MP Greville Janner said at the start of the meeting.

Qatar's foreign minister, Sheikh Hamad Al-Dhan, applauded the progress in the Israeli-Palestinian talks, but said solutions must include "the return of Arab lands to their owners," including "conquered Jerusalem."

Czechs Pass Property Law

PRAGUE — After lengthy debate, the Czech Parliament has enacted legislation calling for the return of property seized from individual Jews during World War II.

Citizens who are permanent residents of the Czech Republic are now entitled to submit their restitution claims for property currently held by the Czech state or municipalities.

The legislation was passed two months after Czech President Vaclav Havel joined the local Jewish leadership in criticizing the failure of parliament to pass a restitution bill.

Last month, Jewish groups reached agreements with the governments of Hungary and Slovakia for the restitution of Jewish property seized during the Holocaust.

Restitution claims for Jewish communal property held by the Czech Republic — including synagogues, cemeteries and other estates, such as the collections of the Prague Jewish Museum — will not be affected by the new law. Restitution claims for those properties will fall under separate legal provisions.

Neo-Nazis Nabbed

BUDAPEST — Police here last week arrested two Hungarian neo-Nazi leaders after raiding their apartments and confiscating swastikas and neo-fascist literature.

Police seized hundred of stickers bearing swastikas, which cannot be publicly displayed under Hungarian law.

The two men have declared themselves successors to the World War II fascist Arrow Cross leader and Nazi collaborator Ferenc Szalasi.

Synagogue Arsonists Arrested

LUBECK — Four young men have been arrested in an arson attack six weeks ago against a synagogue in this northern German city. The accused, aged 19 to 24, will be charged with attempted murder and arson.

Hatred of foreigners and Jews prompted the attack, the federal prosecutor's office said in a statement.

In late March, the four allegedly threw two Molotov cocktails into the entrance of the building which houses the synagogue. It was the first attack on a synagogue since the Nazi era.

No one was hurt and only slight damage was caused to the synagogue.

Following the attack, thousands marched in Lubeck and other cities against hatred of foreigners and Jews.

In late April, over 100 German artists opened an exhibit in Lubeck to raise money for repairing the synagogue. Organizers said the exhibition was "a sign of solidarity with our Jewish neighbors."

Schindler's Factory Tourist Spot?

KRAKOW — This city may have a new tourist attraction this season: Oskar Schindler's enamelware factory, which was used for location shots in the film Schindler's List.

The factory, the actual place where Schindler employed the 1,100 Jews he saved, now produces electrical components.

It was open to the public last month, when at least 800 teenage participants of the March of the Living visited it — each charged the equivalent of $1 entrance fee.

Workers at the factory, located in an outlying industrial district between the wartime ghetto and Plaszow concentration camp, say they are considering opening the plant to other tourists this season.

We Meet Again, Dr. Jones

GRANDE PRAIRIE, Alta. — An 18-year-old student from this Alberta town has embarked on a real-life adventure: finding the lost Ark of the Covenant.

Kelly Huckaby is the lone Canadian on a 30-member international team now in Israel searching for the ark, the large vessel said to have held the two tablets of the Ten Commandments.

The dig is spearheaded by Prof. Vendyl Jones, whose 27-year search for the ark inspired Stephen Spielberg's Indiana Jones movies.

Huckaby signed up after hearing reports earlier this year about Prof. Jones's efforts.

The team will spend two gruelling months in Israel, climbing rock-strewn slopes, hoeing rubble and hauling equipment to and from caves in the Judean wilderness.

Ouellet Praises Signing

OTTAWA — Canada's Foreign Minister Andre Ouellet has welcomed last week's signing in Cairo of the self-rule accord between Israel and the PLO.

"This agreement marks a major milestone on the long road to peace in the Middle East," Ouellet said in a statement. "It is eloquent testimony to the courage and leadership of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chairman Yasser Afarat."

Environmental and genetic aging faces a formidable enemy in the well-informed baby boom generation. this group has shifted its emphasis away from radical surgery to a preventative, natural approach to skin treatment. Dr. John Goldhar, director of Toronto's Facial Rejuvenation Centre, adheres to and promotes the new approach.

Dr. Goldhar, head of Dermatology at Mount Sinai Hospital, received his Canadian fellowship and diploma from the American Board of Dermatology in 1977. His staff includes Drs. Anne Curtis and Sandra Landolt, both with degrees in Dermatology and Internal Medicine. The medical staff directs the Centre's cosmetic aestheticians, Suzanne Hay and Kella DeMiglio.

Face peels using light fruit extracts reduce pore size in sun damaged skin, remove or diminish fine lines and "liver spots", and give skin a radiant, youthful glow. The Centre's new Krypton laser removes facial blood vessels (as well as "liver spots" without disturbing bruising which other lasers produce. Clients can benefit from Dr. Goldhar's ten years' experience with collagen replacement, using fine-line collagen to help eliminate frown lines, crows' feet around the eyes, and annoying lipstick bleeding lines around the mouth. With summer approaching, the Centre is also seeing increased demand for sclero therapy - performed by physicians - to eliminate unsightly leg veins.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Joseph Kohane who directs the Ohio State University Hillel in Columbus, Ohio recently wrote ". . . Judaism strikes the listener as authoritative only when it sounds some depth in their being. In their experience, no evocation of divine Jewish imperative will be convincing for most that is not paired with some relevant human personal, spiritual, social, political reality."

This is a striking statement because, although it appears to be a truism, in many Jewish communities this is not so. Judaism for too many of our people is a civic and public endeavor. It never, as Kohane observes, touches their personal lives. It is not evocative of desires or concerns within their beings. Judaism is for many an external exercise in political and social affairs with the life cycle as an adjunct. G-D is not part of their lives. Torah, if it is part of their lives is "Torah-lite" which cannot evoke nor plumb the depths of living. Even Israel is a matter of public and financial support alone, not the centre of Jewish life or the laboratory for the resurgence of Judaism and Jewish life which it should surely become.

All of us are responsible for this situation. Either we have not wanted to hear or we have been incapable of hearing a statement like that of Joseph Kohane. We have not constituted our communities so Jewish activity and authenticity includes study and culture and synagogue attendance as well as attendance at rallies and meetings — personal, human needs as well as communal ones. We need to keep in mind that we cannot know which specific programs will "save" the Jewish community.

We may only be certain of this: Jewish individuals will at least consider looking to their roots to find meaning in their lives. The task of the Jewish community therefore, is to show how Jewish life is responsive to people's existential and developmental needs.

This is not an easy endeavor. It requires looking once more at our modus operandi. We have to consider the ongoing appeal of Judaism and not take this appeal for granted.

Let us be honest with ourselves. A sizable minority of Jews in the Diaspora would describe their Jewish identity in this way: "I am a Jew in order to spite the anti-Semites. I don't think in a Jewish vocabulary. I don't eat or sing as a Jew, I don't pray in Jewish settings or with Jewish meanings, but I will not hand Hitler any posthumous victories." Such Jews are affiliated with Judaism on an ethnic basis, and only when that ethnicity is threatened from the outside do they "stand guard." These Jews need to be touched. They need to be brought in from their "guard duty." They need to be fed with food for their souls and food for their lives.

Lawyer seeks missing Torah part

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Canadian lawyer Karen Kolodny is playing sleuth these days.

She's looking for a Torah or, rather, parts of a Torah, in order to complete what she feels is a mitzvah.

Kolodny, a Montreal native and McGill University graduate, currently lives and works in Prague, capital of the Czech Republic. Last year, she bought about one-third of a Torah — the middle third, including all of the Book of Exodus and part of Leviticus — in an antique bookstore in Prague.

"A friend saw it there and was stunned," Kolodny said. "I went to the shop and saw it displayed hanging on the wall."

Speaking during a recent visit to Rome, she said the proprietor of the shop — a "rogue," she called him — told her that the Torah had been hidden under a Prague building and found during recent restoration work.

He indicated to Kolodny that tourists had already bought the missing pieces of the scroll.

Kolodny purchased the remaining part of the Torah.

"I felt like I was doing a mitzvah to get it out of the hands of that rogue," she said. "And I would have paid a lot more than I did."

Karen Kolodny

She took the Torah back to North America, where she showed it to sofers, or scribes — one Ashkenazi and one Sephardi — in New York and Montreal.

"They told me the Torah was still kosher," she said. "The parchment was unlaced to remove the missing pieces, not cut. Both sofers said the Torah was probably 80 to 90 years old, and that it probably was of German origin. It is in very good condition."

In Montreal, she also showed the scroll to Rabbi Sidney Shoham of Beth Zion Congregation, who displayed it to his congregation and used it as a focal point of an emotional sermon before the Yizkor prayer for the departed was recited last Yom Kippur.

Now, Kolodny said, she wants to find the other pieces of the Torah and make it whole again.

Perhaps she could locate the tourists who bought the other segments of the scroll, she said. Otherwise, there remains the possibility of adding to the segments she has with newly copied sections.

"Wouldn't it be a lovely story to put it back together again?" she asked.

Whether or not she manages to find the original missing pieces, Kolodny hopes eventually to donate the scroll to an appropriate recipient.

Meanwhile, she added, the Torah is safely stored.

Anyone who feels he or she may have bought the missing parts of the Torah in Prague can write to Karen Kolodny at: ul. Kozi 19, Prague 110 00, Czech Republic.

Russia no longer casts a shadow over the Mideast

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Feature Service

Just before Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin entered a meeting with Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev last month in Moscow, a Russian aide whispered to his Israeli counterpart to cut the session short.

Kozyrev had to fly to Geneva for an unscheduled meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

The Rabin-Kozyrev meeting lasted only 45 minutes, during which the Russian asked cursory questions about the mood in Israel. After a quick lunch, Kozyrev headed for Geneva.

As far as can be determined, that brief encounter was typical of the first visit to Moscow by an Israeli prime minister.

At no time during Rabin's meetings with senior Russian officials, apparently, did Moscow seek to interject itself into the substance of either Israeli-Palestinian or Israeli-Syrian diplomacy.

Instead, President Boris Yeltsin promised Rabin that the days of the Russian bear casting its long shadow over the Middle East are over. Rabin reported that while Russian arms sales to the region will continue, he was satisfied that Moscow will keep its promise and refrain from exporting weapons systems Israel deems harmful.

Yeltsin's assurances were particularly welcome because Rabin had approached the trip to Moscow with a mixture of excitement and gnawing anxiety.

Rabin was pleased to be the first prime minister in Israel's 46-year history to visit Moscow. The end of the visitation ban was ushered in with full military honors.

Pomp and circumstance aside, Rabin was wary of Moscow's recent proclamations that it intended to reassert itself as a foreign-policy heavyweight, especially in light of the strong showing of xenophobic Vladimir Zhirinovsky in last December's elections.

While Zhirinovsky's success has generally been characterized as a protest vote against the social dislocation brought on by painful economic reforms, it also could be seen as a public backlash against Moscow's abandonment of the foreign policy stage to the United States.

Increased Russian interest in the conflicts in Bosnia and the Middle East set off alarm bells in Jerusalem. A little more than a month ago, Rabin sought to fend off the arrival of Russian diplomats to the region.

American and Russian officials say Russia's attempt to reassert itself on the foreign-policy scene does not extend to serious geopolitical ambitions in the Middle East. The fact is that Moscow faces serious problems at home with limited resources to solve them.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin meets Israel Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in Moscow.

Moscow's renewed diplomatic maneuverings may annoy Washington but, according to Russian officials and academics, Yeltsin's government is not out to undermine America's Middle East diplomacy.

Rabin emerged from his meeting with Yeltsin saying that Washington and Moscow are in agreement on a general course for Middle East peace.

"There is also a Russian desire to cooperate more with the U.S. in the Middle East, and not just the Middle East. If this really happens, I'll see it as a very important position," he told Israeli reporters.

Victor Gogitidze, a top official in the Russian Foreign Ministry who specializes in the Middle East and is rumored to be the next ambassador to Damascus, said that making peace was the province of the parties themselves, without big-power intervention.

Rabin is correct to insist upon "quiet talks with Syria away from the cameras," Gogitidze said, insisting that Russia did not plan to tilt toward Damascus.

"Traditionally we had good relations with Syria. Now we want to build a balanced or even-handed relationship with both Israel and Syria," Gogitidze said.

Moscow's agenda is less to chart an independent course for its foreign policy than to win recognition as an important player, Russian analysts suggest. Once a sprawling empire, Moscow does not want to be publicly humiliated.

Prof. Vitaly Naumkin, Middle East expert for the Moscow-based Oriental Institute, said: "We are talking about a kind of prestige. Every Russian feels that after being a superpower, we don't want to be regarded as a second-rate state ...The worse thing is not to be consulted."

If this is indeed the case, Rabin believes he can do better with honey than vinegar. Instead of shunning the Russians, the better course would be to meet them and brief them on negotiations, since they are officially cosponsors of the peace talks since the Madrid conference in 1991.

Beyond stroking Moscow's ego, consultations could eliminate misunderstandings, especially considering the lack of top-echelon dialogue for 46 years.

At a dinner hosted by Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin in Rabin's honor, a senior Russian official admitted that Moscow's intelligence assessments of Israel in the past were disastrously wrong.

They were always far more nefarious than warranted, and only top-level contact between the two countries can remedy this, Rabin later recalled.

It could even lead to cooperation in areas of joint interest regarding third parties. The two leaders agreed on the dangers of Iran-based Islamic militancy. It appears that working-level conversations between Russia and Israel on the topic of Islamic militancy are already taking place.

Consultation and dialogue cannot adequately define Russia's renewed engagement in the Middle East. One of the few areas where Moscow's products are considered world class is arms, and it desperately seeks hard currency.

Prof. Irina Zviagelskaia, an Oriental Institute Middle East expert who has written a book on the Israel Defence Foces, explained Russia's quandary.

Former Russian clients are either pariahs or broke, she insisted, and Western countries do not allow Moscow access to the lucrative Gulf market.

Rabin, agreeing it's untenable to insist that Moscow halt all arms exports to the Middle East while the United States sells to Israel and other Middle East countries, modulated his request on this score.

On the topic of sales to Iran, Yeltsin told Rabin that weapons exports to Teheran would be defensive, not offensive.

Yeltsin also assured Rabin that a 20-member top-level delegation from Moscow visiting Damascus would not discuss upgrading weapons, apparently referring to the Sukhoi-27 jet fighter and the SA-10 air-to-surface missile.

Yeltsin's interest in hard currency led to the once unimaginable scenario of urging Israel to consider defence cooperation.

Concerned about U.S. reaction that there could be "seepage" of transferred American technology, Rabin deferred Yeltsin's request for now. Rabin settled on the more modest goal of a joint venture to build small executive civilian aircraft, using Israeli avionics.

With a watchful eye on the extent of the Moscow-Damascus arms links, Rabin will be looking to see if Russia keeps its promises in its dealings with Israel and the Arab countries.

Hilberg has spent a lifetime studying the Holocaust

By ARNOLD AGES

Although he lives in a city and a state remote from the great metropolitan centres, Raul Hilberg is in no way isolated from the world of ideas. Because of his pioneering research in Holocaust history, moreover, he has put the small city of Burlington on Lake Champlain and the University of Vermont at the very centre of Holocaust studies.

Arnold Ages

That would have seemed an unlikely scenario in 1961, when Hilberg published his epoch-making study, The Destruction of European Jewry, a massive (more than 1,000 pages) and meticulously documented account of the way in which the Nazis organized and implemented the annihilation of European Jewry.

Hilberg indicated in an interview that when he first approached publishers about his manuscript, "no one was interested in the Holocaust." Finally a small publishing house, Quadrangle, was persuaded to bring out the book.

Since the publication of the work 33 years ago (and the appearance of a definitive revised edition in 1985), its terrifying excellence has made Hilberg into an international figure who has lectured on Holocaust themes all over the world. That fame brought him to Toronto in 1985 where he testified for the Crown in the first trial of Ernst Zundel.

Sitting in the living room of the house he occupies in Burlington, Hilberg indicated that he had just returned from a lecture in California, where, he admitted, he had been somewhat eclipsed by the presence at the sessions of Mrs. Oskar Schindler and by the film, Schindler's List.

Hilberg reflected thoughtfully on the film and wondered aloud about certain "counterfactual" scenes in the movie. What scenes was he referring to? He alluded to the factory sequence in Czechoslovakia where Schindler's Jews were said to be producing armaments "which never worked."

"This is untrue," said Hilberg, quoting conversations with survivors who have pointed out that it was silly to speak of sabotage when SS guards and other Nazi security personnel constantly monitored weapons production.

Despite reservations about the quirky nature of art in the service of history, Hilberg recognizes Speilberg's genius and concedes that his own critical reflections came, not while he was watching the film in a Burlington theatre, but afterwards. He was particularly impressed by the scene in which a German soldier, in the midst of the brutal round-up of Jews in Krakow, stops to play the piano. This scene, he noted, was based on truth, if not the specific truth shown in the film. He said that at the Berlin headquarters of the office designated for Jewish affairs (IV Amt 4) high-level Nazi officers organized a string quartet!

When Hilberg first published his opus in 1961, there were no Holocaust deniers. Now this book and his recently published, Perpetrators And Collaborators stand as bulwarks of documented truth against the fabrications of the Holocaust deniers. Hilberg is unique, moreover, in that he possesses intimidating knowledge of the Nazi blueprint for the murder of European Jewry.

He did not discover that blueprint overnight. He first became aware of it in 1948 as a graduate student at Columbia University, eleven years after his escape from his native Vienna. His research led him to more than 40,000 pages of documents from the Nuremberg tribunals which American prosecutor Telford Taylor had deposited at Columbia.

His historical detective work led Hilberg to Alexandria, Virginia, the major American depository for captured German documents. There Hilberg devoted himself to the task of reading, collating and organizing some of the 28,000 feet of shelves containing the written record of the Nazi past.

Thirteen years after beginning his research (which was done, he noted, without the assistance of computers, faxes or even copiers), Hilberg published his monumental study — mostly to rave reviews. Some, however, faulted him for his suggestion that more than passivity was involved in the fate of the Jews. Others were offended by Hilberg's inculpation of the Judenrat officials who provided the Nazis with lists of Jewish names and assisted them in bureaucratic ways. Historian H. Trever Roper, Hilberg noted, was among his first critics.

Three decades later Hilberg is still sensitive to these criticisms, especially the allegation that he used the phrase "like sheep to slaughter" in referring to Jewish responses to Nazi crimes. "I never, ever used that phrase — nowhere. People ask me how I would have behaved during the Holocaust. I cannot say with absolute certainty how but I would not have been compliant; it is not in my nature. I would be dead. It's that simple."

Asked whom he regarded as heroes during the Holocaust, Hilberg identified two individuals in particular, Mordecai Anielewicz, the leader of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and Rudolph Vrba, the Czech Jew who escaped from Auschwitz and tried to communicate the truth about the concentration camp to unbelieving officials in Hungary and Switzerland. Hilberg has recently come across important documents relating to the Vrba revelations and described them as hair-raising.

Hilberg has spent a lifetime analyzing the how of the Holocaust but is reticent to comment on the why. Pressed on this point, he parried by saying that the why is beyond rationality. He suggested that it was the irrationality of the Holocaust which made it possible. In the labor camps Jews reasoned that the Nazis would never kill them because then they would lose their labor force. Yet the Nazis did kill them despite the fact that there was no gain in doing so. The irrationality factor can also be seen, said Hilberg, in Stalin's decision to "trust" that Hitler would not attack the Soviet Union because there was no gain in it. "Ultimately there is no answer to the why," said Hilberg.

Among the many incisive comments which Hilberg offered during the interview, one in particular stands out. It came during a discussion of the mistrust which Holocaust survivors have as a legacy of their experiences. Said Hilberg: "For most people paranoia is a sickness; for Jews it is medicine."

Landmark accord

With last week's agreement in Cairo, Israel and the PLO have taken the first concrete step on the rocky road toward a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East.

The landmark accord is important to both sides. For Israel, it opens the door for a historic rapprochement with the Arab world — a process that in fact has already begun — and in the interval ensures its security. For the Palestinians, it lays the groundwork for self-rule, a goal that has tragically eluded them for decades.

In Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's words, the agreement is "a very daring project," a harbinger, one hopes, of Arab-Israeli reconciliation after years of bloodshed and mutual animosity. Furthermore, as Rabin pointed out long before it was signed and sealed in the presence of a plethora of dignitaries, this agreement can serve as a bulwark against the still-constant threat of Islamic fundamentalism.

Yet, as Foreign Minister Shimon Peres wisely suggested, "much work still lies before us." In a very real sense, the movement toward peace has really only begun. In the meantime, there are concerns. Can the PLO administer the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho in a responsible manner? Judging by Yasser Arafat's request for a three to four week delay in Israel's withdrawal, is the PLO even ready to assume that onerous task? And how organized is the PLO? The question is pertinent in light of Arafat's initial reluctance to sign one page of the agreement, an act of political theatre which diminished him.

And, one might ask, is the PLO capable of controlling Hamas, which rejects Israel's very existence and opposes a diplomatic solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

We will soon know the answers to these pressing questions, and they may well dictate the outcome of the entire peace process. But, for now, let us rejoice. Israel and the PLO, once bitter enemies, are now allies — however reluctant — in the common cause of peace.

Mission accomplished

A new, hopeful era in Israel's relationship with Russia, the largest republic in the now-defunct Soviet Union, was ushered in last month with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's official visit to Moscow.

Israel and the old Soviet Union established formal diplomatic relations shortly after Israel's birth in 1948. But due to the Cold War, Joseph Stalin's anti-Semitic paranoia, Israel's tilt to the West and the Soviet Union's alliance with the Arab world, Moscow's relations with Jerusalem were more often than not characterized by tension and animosity.

Only in its twilight years, with Mikhail Gorbachev at the helm, did the Soviet Union deign to reach out and normalize its links with Israel.

Rabin's presence in Moscow, the first by an Israeli premier, is important for several reasons. The Russians welcomed Rabin as a friend and not as a potential adversary. Rabin met with President Boris Yeltsin, Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev, Defence Minister Pavel Grachev and the speaker of the Russian parliament, Ivan Rybkin. In addition, Rabin addressed the Russian army's high command, and conferred with Jewish community leaders.

This was not a cosmetic trip. Rabin signed agreements on cooperation in trade, science, technology, culture, education, sports and tourism. And in what appears to be a significant concession, the Russians pledged not to sell offensive military equipment either to Syria or Iran. In fact, two days after Rabin's departure, Russia and Syria signed a military and technical cooperation accord in which Moscow agreed to supply Damascus with "defensive weapons and spare parts." On the political front, Russia and Israel discussed Islamic fundamentalism, a phenonemon of deep concern to both nations. This issue may yet solidify Israel's relations with Russia, whose southern border is potentially vulnerable to Islamic militancy.

Not unexpectedly, Rabin and his Russian hosts touched on the ageless problem of anti-Semitism. By all accounts, Chernomyrdin assured Rabin that a new wave of anti-Semitism would not surface in Russia. It is good to hear that the Russian government will do its utmost to combat the scourge of anti-Semitism, which has been fanned by demagogue Vladimir Zhirinovsky and others. But since the situation in Russia is fluid, it will have to be monitored closely, and Jewish communities abroad should not discount the possibility of an upsurge of emigration in the future.

Viewed in perspective, Rabin's whirlwind visit appears to have been successful. Apart from expanding Israel's bilateral ties with Russia, Rabin came away with solemn Russian promises to fight anti-Semitism and to ban the sale of destabilizing offensive weapons to countries such as Syria.

SEMINAR MISSED BOAT

My heart pounded with excitement when I caught sight of the headline "Multitude of Orthodox women's roles to be examined at a seminar" (CJN April 14). Here at last, I thought, was a chance to hear how other Orthodox women balance the extraordinary stresses of being a wife, mother, daughter, and member of the Orthodox community, while maintaining a full-time career.

How profound was my disappointment when I read the article (as well as the flyer my eldest son brought home from school) and discovered the details of the program. Not a single session dealing with the problems of work outside the home. Obviously, the organizers of this seminar are oblivious to the reality that many Orthodox families cannot afford to send their children to day schools on the salary of a single parent, and would rather have two incomes than be subsidized by others. For widows and the increasing number of divorced women, earning a living is a necessity. I won't even mention the possibility of an Orthodox woman actually choosing a career "chas vechallila" for her own self-fulfilment.

Equally disappointing to me was the fact that at a seminar "for women about women" as advertised in the flyer, the key presentations would all be by men.

WHY A BULL'S HEAD?

In regard to your story "Controversy continues to rage over sculpture" (Montreal edition, March 24), there seemed to be some concern among the Jewish community as to what the sculpture of a bull's head represents in front of an art institution like the Saidye Bronfman Centre and why it was placed there.

The following may provide one explanation which the author failed to mention. In the province of Quebec there is a law that says one per cent of the budget of an institution or building must be set aside for a work of art, whether it be a sculpture, a painting or a monument. This is part of the provincial government's policy to integrate art with the architecture. Throughout Montreal one finds all types of art in front of buildings and the SBC is no exception.

GHETTO TO PENTHOUSE

I'd like to comment on Arnold Ages' "Jewish civilization and architecture" (April 14). While Professor Ages cites a number of prominent Jewish architects, the names of Jack Diamond and Peter Eisenman are conspicuously absent from his list — the former for Jerusalem's Civic Centre and the latter for his contributions to postmodern design. Also noteworthy are Frank Gehry, Daniel Liebeskind, and Stanley Tigerman.

One might also wish to explore Saul Bellow's comment about the shift in perspective from European castles to modest American dwellings as depicted in Thoreau's Walden. If Jews were more often than not excluded from high European ceilings, they felt more at home in the democratic vistas and solid floors of the New World. In other words, the transition from humble origins in ghetto and shtetl to the American scene was smoother than the passage across the Atlantic.

The sociologist Werner Sollors reminds us of the immigrants' need to escape the claustral tenement setting by climbing to the rooftop which functions as Mount Sinai or at the very least a perch for American-Jewish dreams. A generation or two later, we may have moved from the boiler room to the penthouse, from ghetto to suburbia, and from the memory of Egyptian bondage and bricklaying to the Freemasonry of American assimilation, but the fiddler on the roof remains part of our imagination's blueprint.

WHILE THERE IS TIME

Since I am a Dutch child survivor, hidden in Holland by a Gentile family, I was particularly pleased to read that Mrs. Miedema and the late Rev. Miedema were being honored as Righteous Gentiles.

For most hidden children, it took 50 years to have the courage to relate and speak to others about our experiences during those dark days; therefore, many times the most important people in our stories —the Righteous among the Nations — whom we owe our lives to, are not recognized. It was them, after all, not us who were the heroes in our stories; we unfortunately were the innocent victims.

I recently found the courage to do so by letter, even though I am in touch with my "warmother" yearly, and she was honored by our family in Israel at the Yad Vashem Avenue of the Righteous, where a tree was planted in her honor many years ago. When she received my letter, she was so touched that she thanked me.

JEWS IN HEBRON

Charles Anthony (Letters, March 31) makes a great point of young people today not knowing history. Generally, I agree with him. I certainly agree that one should know history and learn from it. I also remember 1938 and subsequent events, but I'm afraid Mr. Anthony's memory is somewhat selective.

Much as we may want to forget it, the U.N. in 1947 did not create only the state of Israel. It partitioned what was left of Palestine into two states. Ironically, because the Arabs and Palestinians refused to consider this solution (the Jews accepted it and won the War of Independence) Israel is significantly larger than intended — and the Palestinian entity/state (whenever it comes) will be much smaller than intended by the U.N. We can argue about the borders, but it certainly was intended by the world, and accepted by the Jews that a Palestinian state was to exist next to, and intertwined with, our Israel.

He states that "there is no reason for Jews to feel guilty about living in Hebron." Certainly not. But they should live in peace and respect the rights and lives of their neighbors.

He continues: "It is time Arabs gave up hate . . . to live in Israel . . . I agree about them giving up hate. But it looks to me like some of us have some giving up to do too. As for living in Israel, I have now seen several letters and articles by supporters of "Greater Israel," and I do not wish to debate the pros and cons of this approach here. However, no matter how much Mr. Anthony and his friends would like it to be, the fact is that neither Hebron, nor Judea nor Samaria are in Israel. Saying it is, and hoping we don't notice the inaccuracy, does not make it so. Sorry Charles.

Can you pronounce Dniepropetrovsk?

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

It was in the locker room of York Racquets Club that I heard the latest about the Jewish community in the Ukrainian city of Dniepropetrovsk, located on the Dnieper River, near its confluence with the Samara. It houses some million or more people who are engaged in industrial production, especially of iron and steel, locomotives and agricultural machinery.

Rabbi Plaut

I always had difficulty pronouncing the name which the Soviets had given to a town which since the 18th century had been known as Yekaterinoslav, but the latest tale of this city convinced me that I had to throw all caution to the wind and write about it.

Now to the story. George Cohon, formerly president and now senior chairman of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada, had just returned from Russia and Ukraine, where for years he has been engaged in establishing a chain of restaurants.

It so happens that George's father was born in 1906 in what was still Yekaterinoslav and as a baby was taken to the United States to escape further progroms.

Many years later, in 1991, his son George was invited back by the city's mayor and City Council, who had become aware of an article in Pravda which indicated that his family's roots were in their town. Subsequently he participated in a huge public affair and rode into the stadium to cut the ribbon for a children's festival before some 25,000 people.

In the olden days there were some 80 synagogues in the city; today there is only one. George visited it and kept track of the resurgence of Jewish life, so that when he received a letter from Rabbi Samuel Kaminezki, of Dniepropetrovsk, which Rabbi Joseph Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto made available to him, he lent an attentive ear.

Rabbi Kaminezki had written something like this: "There is an urgent matter and perhaps someone could help us with it. I would like to make a seder for all children in school with their parents. For many it will be the first time in their lives they will have been at a seder. Five thousand dollars would help us to do it. Maybe the gentleman who comes from our city would be able to help us with it."

George and Susan Cohon responded immediately and the money was forwarded to Ukraine. The result was that some 1,400 people had a seder, and as the rabbi said, for most of them it was the first time in their lives.

But what intrigued me especially was the joy which George and his family received from the mitzvah they had done. Tradition teaches us that one mitzvah brings another in its trail, and I am sure that the Cohon family's participation will engender its own follow-ups.

Meanwhile, the condition of Jews in Ukraine is not without its problems, and for many, emigration is a subject of urgent concern. Perhaps the reading of the Haggadah and the mentioning of an exodus of earlier days stimulated them to take their own potential exodus into serious consideration.

Will Hamas try to undermine peace accord?

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Service

The question of Hamas looms larger than ever now that Israel and the PLO have signed a groundbreaking autonomy accord.

Will the Muslim fundamentalist movement continue to undermine what the Israeli government sees as the promise of peace between Jews and Palestinians?

Will it join in the Palestinian autonomy as a tactical step on the road to its goal of an Islamic state in all of Palestine?

Or will it one day content itself to be simply a stream in a secular Palestinian society coexisting alongside Israel?

If anything, recent events have brought only the questions, and not the answers, into clearer focus.

The news that a Hamas cell had been arrested for the April 13 bombing of a bus in Hadera contrasted sharply with simultaneous reports of a ceasefire agreement between Hamas and the PLO in the Gaza Strip.

Military and civilian sources said the indications of Hamas pragmatism were not unwelcome, though the Israeli army and security services will continue their relentless war against Hamas terrorism.

In the aftermath of the Hadera and Afula car bombings, and a string of lesser attacks, the army and security forces conducted a sweep of known Hamas activists throughout the territories, arresting close to 300 of them.

Often during the past months of domestic debate and controversy over the Israeli-PLO accord, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has argued that to spurn the PLO now could mean having to deal with the intractable Hamas later.

Yet Hamas officials and spokesmen — those not rounded up in the latest dragnet — are appearing in the Israeli media with increasing frequency these days. While that is not tantamount to a formal dialogue with the government, it does mean that Israel is, to an extent, "dealing" with Hamas now.

One dramatic sign that all is not typical came recently, in moderate-sounding statement by Mussa abu-Marzouk, a senior Hamas political figure now living in Jordan.

He spoke of the movement's readiness to come to terms with Israel — conditional on full withdrawal from the territories taken during the 1967 Six Day War.

He also hinted that Hamas would participate in elections in the territories, which are scheduled to be held in July.

This moderation was a far cry from the bloodchilling television appearances by Hamas officials in Amman, Jordan, in the wake of the Afula and Hadera blasts, vowing further bloody reprisals against innocent Israelis in retaliation for the Hebron massacre of Feb. 25.

The recent cease-fire accord concluded between Hamas and the PLO provides for an end to internecine violence, and a month-long moratorium on the pursuit of "collaborators."

These latter are often tortured and killed in the most gruesome manner, mainly by the Izz a-Din al-Kassam armed units of Hamas, but also on occasion by various bands of young gunmen professing allegiance to one or other of the nationalist-secularist Palestinian movements.

The truce cannot but be seen as preparation, by both streams within Palestinian society in the Gaza, for self-government.

This assessment is shared by both schools of observers on the Israelis side: those who see the signs of moderation in Hamas as merely tactical, and those who see them as presaging a deeper and more radical shift in approach by the Islamic fundamentalists living in the territories.

The present state of Hamas' ideological development has been compared to that of the PLO in 1974, when its leader, Yasser Arafat, first showed signs of pragmatism. He spoke then of Palestinian rule in any part of the homeland relinquished by the Israeli occupier. At that time, of course, the PLO was still steeped in terror and wanton violence — as indeed it was to remain for many years thereafter.

The realization now, however, of partial Israeli withdrawal and partial Palestinian government presents Hamas with the need to make its choices faster than the PLO did.

Will Hamas take an active part in the governance of Gaza, the movement's stronghold and the first area, along with the West Bank town of Jericho, to experiment with self-rule under the terms of the peace accord? That question will have to be answered within a matter of weeks.

Says Walid al-Hindi, 32, secretary of the Islamic University in Gaza: "If life is democratic — we will take part in running it, in order to rebuild Palestinian society." Al-Hindi is considered one of the rising stars in the Gaza fundamentalist firmament. Yet he speaks without inhibitions to Israeli reporters.

His message is that the fundamentalists represent a very substantial segment of Palestinian pubic life and cannot be ignored — either by the PLO or by Israel.

Another, more senior figure in the movement, who declined to be quoted by name, told the Israel newspaper Ha'aretz that Israel ought to be interested in encouraging "moderates" inside Hamas to influence, in turn, the hardliners.

The jailed founder of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, was quoted in Reuters recently as saying that Hamas opposition to the peace accord would be non-violent.

But for Israel, at this stage at any rate, the view of Hamas must still be, principally, through the sights of a rifle.

What do you do when you Sha-voo?

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

It is pretty easy to tell your boss that you need to take a day or so off from work for Rosh Hashanah or even Passover. But unless you work for a fairly observant Jewish person, you will get a blank look — at best — when you ask for time off for Shavuot.

I mentioned getting ready for Shavuot to a non-practising Jewish girl friend, a terrific woman with whom I have a warm relationship based on career compatibility and constant humor, and she asked, half-seriously, "What do you do when you Sha-voo?"

Erica Meyer Rauzin

Well, you recount the history of the Sinai experience, the receiving of the Torah; you read the Book of Ruth; you eat a new fruit; you make a lot of dairy meals; and you study late, or if you are particularly hardy, all night long.

If you haven't pulled an all-nighter since your last final exam, it's a heady experience.

I remember those collegiate all night marathons. In those days I could stay awake, force-feed myself information by reducing it to a series of shorter and shorter outlines, power load junk food, and still manage to make it to class, survive the exam, and hang out eating pizza after it was all over. It might have taken me a couple of long naps to recover, but if it did, memory doesn't deign to mention it. Somehow, I recall having an invincible constitution. I wish I had it still. If I had understood how fleeting that sturdiness is, I'd have savored it more.

As it was, I challenged my youthful strength with chocolate, coffee, and sleep deprivation on a pretty regular basis. I recall that the study session for one particularly cruel exam took two all-nighters, two entire bags of semi-sweet chocolate chips, and several milkshakes from the all-night fast food shop.

But then, as now, the company you keep makes all the difference. I was fortunate to be part of a nearly familial group of students in college, a cluster of tight friends who did everything together, who bolstered each other, who stayed up all night studying together if that was what it took.

Last Shavuot, which was the first time I stayed up studying deep into the night, I fell into a similar experience. Through Project Heritage, our neighborhood had a late night study session for women, led by a superb teacher.

Those of us who could find baby-sitters (because the husbands were studying also) gathered around the teacher's dining table primed to discuss the Book of Ruth. She led us through, sparking questions, debate, and conversation.

The evening was remarkable to me. I was captured by the ideas the women around me expressed. This was a valid reaction: I live in an observant neighborhood and many of my female friends and neighbors are very educated, both in their professions and in the depth of their Judaic knowledge.

This is also slightly invalid, in that the later the night grew, the more the headiness of the all-nighter took hold, the more brilliant my friends seemed to be. Just before we all gave up — sometime around 2 a.m. — I even began wanting chocolate chips, by the bag full.

I asked several people who know a lot more than I do just why we stay up studying on erev Shavuot? They told me we study to get ready for the day of Shavuot, the commemoration of receiving the Torah. We are preparing ourselves.

Try to recall a day so exciting that the anticipation of it kept you awake the night before: your wedding day, your graduation, your first trip overseas. Then transfer that excitement to the night before Shavuot; imagine that — tomorrow morning — you, personally, will be present at the giving of the Torah, lightning, thunder, mystery, majesty, Moses and all.

Do you think you'd get much sleep?

Nope. So, go tell your boss you might need to take the day off. After all, that's what you do when you Sha-voo.

Jackson mends fences

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

With his recent visit to Israel, the Rev. Jesse Jackson has all but mended fences with the Jewish community in the United States.

Jackson was formally invited by Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin. He spent six days in Israel and the territories to "enhance" Israel's peace process with the PLO.

Jackson, one of the most influential black civil rights leaders and politicians in the United States, was treated like a VIP, in sharp contrast to the rather cool reception he received on his last trip in 1979.

During his whirlwind tour last month, Jackson met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

He also attended a conference in East Jerusalem in the company of Palestinian leaders, to mark the 30th anniversary of the founding of the PLO, an organization he always championed as the legitimate representative of the Palestinians. And he addressed a rally in Hebron, which deteriorated into a wild melee when Palestinians clashed with Israeli soldiers.

In time-honored fashion, Jackson visited the Western Wall, Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial and museum, Hadassah Hospital and an absorption centre for new immigrants. In that most Israeli of rituals, he participated in a tree-planting ceremony. And in a gesture of solidarity with the victims of terrorism, he chatted with Israelis in an Afula hospital who had been wounded in a car-bombing for which Hamas had claimed responsibility.

All the while, he had nothing but words of praise for Israel's Sept. 13, 1993 Declaration of Principles with the PLO, which he optimistically described as "a new equation for peace in the Middle East."

As it happened, Jackson's visit coincided with another terrorist incident — a car-bombing in Hadera, perpetrated by Hamas, which killed five more Israelis. No shrinking violet, he took credit for having convinced PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat to publicly condemn it.

In retrospect, Jackson's visit was considered a success, a milestone on the road to complete rehabilitation in the eyes of American Jewry.

Jackson had alienated the Jewish community because:

- He had characterized Zionism as a "poisonous weed."
- He had embraced Arafat in the course of a trip to the Middle East during which he stopped in Israel.
- He had suggested that Jews were behind Andrew Young's resignation as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations after a series of unauthorized contacts with the PLO leadership.
- He had, in supposedly private conversations with a black reporter, derogatorily referred to Jews as "Hymies" and to New York City as "Hymietown."

As a result, Jackson's stock among American Jews plummeted.

Jackson, who valued Jewish support, was stung by accusations that he was an anti-Semite and an anti-Zionist.

Animated by a deep-seated desire to heal the wounds, Jackson launched a public relations offensive at around the time he announced plans to contest the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination.

In fence-mending speeches at Jewish community functions and synagogues, he reminded his listeners that he had stood resolutely with the Jews of Skokie when neo-Nazi marchers invaded that Chicago suburb. He spoke of his commitment to Syrian and Soviet Jewry. He recalled his displeasure with President Ronald Reagan's controversial 1985 visit to a cemetery in Bitburg, Germany where SS soldiers are buried.

As for his embrace of Arafat, he said it should not have been interpreted as a political statement, and disclosed that he had urged the PLO leader "to recognize Israel's right to exist with security, within internationally recognized borders."

During his appearances, Jackson never let anyone forget that he had delivered a strong pro-Israel speech at the Democratic national convention. And, he added, he had conferred with Israel's ambassador to the United States, Moshe Arad, in a meeting that was widely seen as Israeli forgiveness for past mistakes.

Throughout the 1980s, Jackson continued with his efforts at rapprochement with the Jewish community, noting the common problems Jews and African Americans face as minorities.

Despite his being met with some skepticism, Jackson pushed forward, knowing full well that his credentials as a national figure would be questioned unless he improved his troubled relations with Jews.

During the 1991 Gulf War, Jackson lined up with Israel against Iraq. And in the aftermath of the racial disturbances in Brooklyn's Crown Heights district, Jackson did his best to defuse African American-Jewish tensions.

Two years ago, in a widely-lauded address, Jackson denounced "the historic evils of anti-Semitism" at a World Jewish Congress in Brussels.

Last year, at a B'nai B'rith convention in Washington, Jackson declared that blacks and Jews have an "obligation to turn to each other and not on each other" as they combat racism and anti-Semitism.

Jackson's image among Jews, however, is still somewhat tarnished because he has refused to unequivocally condemn Louis Farrakhan, the incendiary head of the Nation of Islam.

Last autumn, Farrakhan's aide, Khalid Abdul Mohammad, blasted Jews as "bloodsuckers" and claimed that Jews had played an important role in the American slave trade.

In the wake of the storm triggered by his verbal onslaught, Farrakhan — whose record of Jew-baiting is well documented — disciplined Mohammad, called his speech "repugnant," but said he accepted its basic "truths."

Along with other mainstream black leaders, Jackson criticized Mohammad, but stopped short of distancing himself from Farrakhan, with whom he has had a long professional relationship.

"From my religious point of view," he has explained, "we are advised to condemn the sin but not the sinner."

Clearly, Jackson's continuing ties with Farrakhan are a sore point insofar as many Jews are concerned. To be sure, Jackson's links with Farrakhan do not imply that Jackson is an anti-Semite. But they do undermine confidence in his oft-repeated and probably sincerely-held conviction that his views have changed.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Leon Degrelle was a Nazi till the day died last month at the age of 87.

"I used to be a Hitlerite and I still am one," he told an interviewer defiantly in 1977 from his haven in Spain.

Degrelle, a Belgian acolyte of the French anti-Semitic politician Charles Maurras, was a founder of the fascist Rex party, an accessory in the round-up of Jews in Belgium, a Waffen SS stalwart and, in the post-war years, a Holocaust denier.

He was born on June 15, 1906 in Bouillon, a small town in the Ardennes region, to a family of French origin. His father, Edouard, was a well-off brewer.

After graduating from a Jesuit college, he studied law at the University of Louvain. By then, he had fallen under the sway of Maurras (1868-1952), who, in conjunction with Leon Daudet (1867-1942), had founded an anti-Semitic newspaper and movement called L'Action francaise.

A gifted polemicist, Degrelle edited a student newspaper while at the University of Louvain. This brought him an offer to edit a Brussels daily, Le XXe siecle. In 1930, he was appointed director of Les editions Rex, a publishing house associated with a far-right Catholic movement in Belgium. A year later, backed by his family and friends, he bought the financially ailing business.

This led Degrelle into politics. In May 1936, Degrelle's Rex party (which stood for Christus Rex, or Christ the king) contested the national election on a platform denouncing the established political parties of the day as hopelessly corrupt. To the amazement of observers, the Rexists captured 10 percent of the vote, electing 21 deputies and 12 senators.

Unrepentant fascist

Degrelle's fame was short-lived. In the subsequent election, Rexist representation in parliament dwindled. On the eve of World War II, the pro-German Degrelle barnstormed the country, urging Belgian neutrality.

After Germany's 1940 invasion of Belgium, he was arrested as a fifth columnist, but was promptly released by the Germans once they had fully occupied their hapless neighbor.

Upwards of 110,000 Jews, including 20,000 German-Jewish refugees, lived in Belgium when that happened. Many managed to escape, but those who didn't were caught by the Germans with the help of local collaborators, including a number of Rexists.

In 1941, following Germany's thrust into the Soviet Union, Degrelle made the fateful decision to form a volunteer battalion of French-speaking Walloons. The Walloon Legion, as it was called, was integrated into the Waffen SS in 1943, and Degrelle rose to the rank of SS general.

By all accounts, the Walloon Legion fought ferociously. Approximately 2,500 of the legionaires were killed in battle. Degrelle himself was wounded seven times. At a wartime ceremony in which he was honored, Hitler accorded him the ultimate accolade. "If I had a son," he said, I would have liked him to be like you."

Degrelle paid dearly for his fealty to Hitler. The Belgian resistance movement assassinated his brother, and after Belgium was liberated by the Allies in September 1944, Degrelle's wife and parents were imprisoned (they died in jail), and his children were dispersed to orphanages and reform schools.

Condemned to death for collaboration, Degrelle fled to Spain, whose dictator, Francisco Franco, welcomed him. (To be completely fair, Franco also allowed thousands of persecuted Jews into Spain). A year later, in 1945, the Belgian government tried in vain to kidnap Degrelle. In 1954, having been naturalized, he was granted Spanish citizenship, nipping in the bud Belgium's request for Degrelle's extradition.

He lived out his life in a villa near the resort of Malaga, an unrepentant fascist who regularly hosted meetings of European neo-Nazis. His book, Campaign in Russia: The Waffen SS on the Eastern Front, was published nine years ago by the California-based Institute of Historical Review, which specializes in Holocaust denial.

Asked some years ago by a journalist if he had any regrets about the war, Degrelle replied, "Only that we lost."

Israeli poet popular

By NECHEMIA MEYERS

The second Israeli to win a Nobel Prize for Literature may well be Jerusalem poet Yehuda Amichai, whose 70th birthday will be marked this month by a special Oxford symposium and the U.S. publication of a 600-poem anthology of his work in English translation.

When Shmuel Agnon won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1966, it was a great surprise. Since he was virtually unknown abroad, few of his books had appeared in English or other foreign languages. Amichai, by contrast, is almost as renowned overseas as he is in Israel, since no less than 19 collections of his poems have been published in other tongues, among them Japanese and Chinese. Moreover, earlier this year, one of them was even featured as the "poem of the month" on the advertising panels of New York subway cars.

Amichai is also more popular at home than the late Shmuel Agnon ever was. School children generally hate having to plow through Agnon's archaic Hebrew and don't readily identify with the characters in his novels, be they denizens of European ghettoes or early Zionist pioneers. But these same youngsters, as well as older Israelis, are at home with Amichai's contemporary Hebrew and often feel that he expresses their thoughts better than they can themselves.

Thus one of his poems was the centrepiece of an unusual military funeral, where, at the request of the fallen soldier's mother, no rabbi was present. Instead of the usual prayers, she read Amichai's poem, "El Malei Rachamim" (God Full of Mercy). It begins: "If God were not so full of mercy, there might be mercy in the world, and not just in him."

On a lighter note, there is a story told by Amichai about a young man who some years ago gave his girlfriend a book of the writer's love poems, one bearing the inscription: "I will let the poet speak on my behalf."

The poems apparently proved persuasive, for the two married. But their marriage didn't last and the man wed twice more. Moreover, Amichai chuckles, he probably also brought two more copies of that book.

Such incidents please Amichai because, in his opinion, poetry should speak to ordinary people. Indeed, he has little use for abstract art, refusing to believe that "art which can be understood immediately, without explanations, is worse than difficult, complex art.

"Whatever you have to say," he adds, "should be said simply and naturally."

One of the things that Amichai has written about simply and naturally is war, which he knows and hates. At the same time, he declared to interviewer Joseph Cohen, "even a complete pacifist may have to face combat in order to survive. The alternative amounts to sitting back and getting yourself slaughtered."

In a particularly moving poem, Amichai dwells upon not only war, but two of his other central themes, God and children. This poem, entitled "God Has Pity on Kindergarten Children," goes:

God has pity on kindergarten children.
He has less pity on schoolchildren.
And on grownups he has no pity at all,
he leaves them alone,
and sometimes they must crawl on all fours,
in the burning sand to reach the first-aid station covered in blood.

A theme to which Amichai always returns is Jerusalem, portrayed with both love and irony. This combination finds expression, for example, in "Jerusalem is Full of Used Jews":

Jerusalem is full of used Jews, worn out by history,
Jews second-hand, slightly damaged, at bargain prices.
And the eye yearns toward Zion all the time.
And all the eyes of the living and the dead are cracked like eggs on the rim of the bowl, to make the city puff up rich and fat.
Jerusalem is full of tired Jews, always goaded on again for holidays, for memorial days, like circus bears dancing on aching legs. What does Jerusalem need? It doesn't need a mayor, it needs a ringmaster, whip in hand, who can tame prophecies, train prophets to gallop around and around in a circle, teach its stones to line up in a bold, risky formation for the grand finale.
Later they'll jump back down again to the sound of applause and wars.
And the eye yearns toward Zion, and weeps.

Philosopher explores black-Jewish tensions

Both groups stigmatized

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Black anti-Semitism is based in part on the perception of Jews as white oppressors, says a black philospher who has studied the phenomenon.

In North America "Jews have always been socially categorized as 'white,' while blacks have always been 'nonwhite,' " writes Dr. Charles Mills of the University of Illinois at Chicago in his brief, Dark Ontologies.

Mills was in Toronto last week to present his views in the first half of a two-part forum on Race and the City, jointly sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple and the Department of Philosophy of the University of Toronto.

Close to 100 people turned out to the downtown campus to hear Mills. An estimated 15 audience members were black.

Mills, who obtained his PhD in Toronto in 1985, didn't delve into local black-Jewish tensions like the Show Boat controversy or the weekend tirade by Nation of Islam follower Khalid Abdul Muhammad, because "I haven't been here and therefore cannot comment intelligently."

He did, however, recall that in his days as a student activist here, "only a few" colleagues were espousing anti-Semitic views.

In his paper, Mills discusses the similarities and differences between blacks and Jews. For every shared experience, Mills points out a divisive difference. For example, while both groups have been murdered by white Christians, only Jews have been compensated (through reparations from the German government).

The physical characteristics of both groups have been stigmatized, Mills writes, but Jewish features are more easily changed than black skin.

Mills also writes that following "the horrors of the death camps, racist ideology of the anti-Semitic kind ceased to be respectable in the West." However, theories about the lower intelligence of blacks and their alleged propensity for violence are still being examined in academic circles.

Mills was in the audience the following night to hear Prof. David Novak of the University of Virginia address the topic of Jewish racism at Holy Blossom Temple. Mills was one of only a handful of blacks.

"I could have chosen the easy path of racism as directed against the Jewish people. . .but that assumes the Jewish people are vulnerable, without the means of self-defence and subject to the acts of others," Novak, 52, told the 100-member audience.

Novak chose instead to address racism by Jews, refuting it with a carefully crafted theological argument.

"Racism is a monumental evil. . .and the only defence we have against evil is our Torah."

For most of his hour-long lecture, Novak drew from Jewish sources to define the Jewish view of racism as a violation of Torah precepts.

The only specific example of Jewish racism he dwelt on was the late Rabbi Meir Kahane's anti-Arab views, which he said are wrong both democratically and theologically.

Even though Jews were chosen by God for a special relationship with Him, Novak said, that does not exonerate them from being just. Kachites, "no matter how pious they may appear otherwise, have violated the basic moral standard of the Torah.

"As the prophet Jeremiah reminds us: People who hang on to the Torah publicly don't always know God or his ways," he said.

However, Novak had no comment on the present tensions between Jews and blacks, other than to say North American Jews must remember that "racism isn't just Kach, but anytime a Jew is unjust."

Shoppers Drug Mart planning to hold marathon on May 15

TORONTO — The Shoppers Drug Mart Toronto Marathon will kick off at 8 a.m. on Sunday May 15 in front of City Hall.

The race should "attract some of the best athletes from around the world," said David Bloom, chair and CEO of Shoppers. "The presence of these top international competitors will inspire the thousands of runners who will be racing."

In addition to the traditional 43-kilometre (26-mile) distance, this year's event features a masters marathon and the Canadian national wheelchair championship.

Organizers and a variety of sponsors are also offering a variety of 10-km runs, including a 10-km corporate relay and a student relay.

Proceeds from the event will go to the Hospital for Sick Children Foundation while proceeds from the student relay are slated for the Pepsi Foundation, which focuses on substance abuse.

Entry forms are available at Shoppers Drug Mart stores across Ontario.

Healing said key to patient care

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Healing patients is just as important as curing them, Rabbi Maurice Lamm of New York told a meeting of the Jewish Hospice Program at Wagman Centre recently. The meeting was attended by about 150 health care workers.

When the cure part of a terminally ill patient's treatment comes to an end, the care, or healing part begins, said Rabbi Lamm, president of the National Institute for Jewish Hospice in the United States. A person can be healed, even if he can't be cured, he said, and this includes amputees and stroke patients.

Healing is more difficult than curing, he said.

Though it was established less than a year ago, there are already 50 patients being cared for at home in Toronto under the Jewish Hospice Program, acccording to Dr. Larry Librach, head of palliative care at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Rabbi Lamm said he was challenged by a hospital division head in New York to prove that patients in a hospice program were living longer than others. "I don't have to prove that, I only have to prove that they are living better," the Rabbi replied.

At a large hospital recently, Rabbi Lamm said he was astounded to hear that a patient with "every congenital disease you can think of" was being served only flounder and pancakes because they were the only foods that could be slipped under the door. "I think they're wrong," he said. "I'm convinced that we're barely beginning to know how to treat such patients."

Healing and curing require different kinds of personalities to be carried out effectively, Rabbi Lamm said.

Old and young to join in UJA March

Fannie Fish

Jaime Filer

TORONTO — Fannie Fish and Jaime Filer may be separated by 92 years, but they share a common commitment to tzedaka.

Fish, at 98 the oldest female contributor to United Jewish Appeal, and 6-year-old Filer, UJA's youngest canvasser, will be leading this year's Community March for Israel May 29.

Last year Filer, along with Associated Hebrew Schools Grade 6 student Tamara Zicherman, collected the most money for the event.

This year, Filer, who attends Leo Baeck Day School at Holy Blossom campus, has come up with $626 by skilfully working the phone.

Fish, UJA's elder stateswoman, remembers gathering tzedakah boxes as a child, and later channeling profits to charity from her St. Catharines clothing store.

"As long as I had money for charity I was happy. I like to do good things."

Until a few years ago, Fish was canvassing for UJA at Baycrest Terrace, where she lives alone. Her husband died 50 years ago. Daughter Ruth Wagman, 70, describes her mother as "bright and dynamite — my girlfriend, who I can talk to about anything, and she understands."

Her mother, she reports, is "quite excited" about leading the March, "because she loves the outdoors and being surrounded by others."

Steinberg library set

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg Memorial Library Collection is being established in the Mt. Sinai Hospital Division of Palliative Care.

The announcement was made after the the first annual memorial lecture for Rabbi Steinberg, held last week at B'nai Torah Synagogue.

Dr. Morton Posner said it was an appropriate memorial, as Rabbi Steinberg, the chaplain of Mt. Sinai Hospital, was instrumental in establishing the Palliative Care Unit there.

Rabbi Steinberg was also the head of Jewish Chaplaincy Services for Ontario and chaplain of Jewish Family & Child Services. He was known for his love of books and scholarship.

The Division of Palliative Medicine recognizes the need for research and educational programs in palliative care. It is proposing to develop a special academic centre to help other medical institutions and the community at large.

A resource centre will acquire, catalogue and develop multi-media resource materials in the field of palliative care. These materials will be made available to health care professionals and the public.

The Rabbi Steinberg Memorial Library Collection will at first focus on material for children and material reflecting special issues around caring for Jewish patients.

An advisory board consisting of rabbis, friends and Rabbi Steinberg's widow, Shirley, has been established to help set up the collection.

Donations can be made through the Mt. Sinai Hospital Foundation, phone (416) 586-8203. Specify the money is to go toward the Resource Centre collection in the Palliative Care division.

Who will pay for the Thibaudeau decision? (first of three parts)

On May 3, 1994 the Federal Court of Appeal ruled that Ms. Thibaudeau, a single mother receiving child support payments, is not liable to pay taxes on them. Technically, the decision only benefits Ms. Thibaudeau, and only for her 1989 tax year. Each receiving or paying spouse must make their own approach to the family law courts and tax authorities independently of this ruling. However, the case sets an important precedent. Being an "appellate decision", it also binds lower courts if it is not successfully appealed. This means that many other courts could be legally bound to follow this decision.

In law the court ruled that the relevant provisions of the Income Tax Act that made these payments taxable contravened Ms. Thibaudeau's equality rights as guaranteed by subsection 15(1) of the Charter. Significantly, the Court ruled that the payments were non-taxable even though the original Court that awarded Ms. Thibaudeau her child maintenance "had taken account of the effect of income tax in fixing the amount of those payments". Indeed, the original lower court had ruled that there was a legal obligation by trial judges to "gross-up" (increase) maintenance payments to take account of tax consequences and that, accordingly, there was no unfairness to women. Their taxes would be paid by their husbands on the support payments they receive. However, the Federal Court ruled that imposition of taxes was unfair for several reasons:

1. The Income Tax act "singles out" persons known as "separated custodial parents";
2. A non-separated custodial parent is not required to include money she receives from her husband as taxable, even if a spouse is court-ordered to do so;
3. A separated spouse (such as a divorced father) who receives financial aid from his parents to help with raising the children is not taxed on such payment;
4. Someone who has custody of a child (such as an Aunt or Grandmother) and who receives support payments from ex-spouses for that child is not taxed on these payments.

Even more significantly, the Court ruled that taking into account tax factors to "gross up" the recipient spouse's payments is no answer to an attack on its taxation by reason of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and for other reasons which I'll discuss in the May 26 issue of this newspaper.

Stronach helps launch Israeli centre for peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Within five minutes of hearing about the Canadian Friends of Haifa University's newest project, Frank Stronach, founder and chair of Magna International Inc., was already a part of it.

"I asked him, and he accepted," said Karen Miller.

The project which so appealed to him has been named the Frank Stronach Centre of Education for Peace. The centre, conceived to foster tolerance, respect and other peace-related interests, was the brainchild of Haifa University history professor Yair Hirschfeld, who played a major behind-the-scenes role in the secret Israel-PLO peace negotiations leading to the Sept. 13 Declaration of Principles.

In recognition of the centre's establishment, a dinner honoring Stronach was held recently at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. Miller, who chaired the dinner committee, said 1,200 people attended the dinner and over $1 million was raised for the new centre in a three-month period.

"I feel honored that I can play a small part in this fundraising," said Stronach. "We have to look for constructive ways to dismantle the chains of domination. Once [people] feel less dominated, [there is] greater hope for world peace."

University rector Aliza Shenhar, who conferred an honorary doctorate on Stronach at the dinner, said "the time is right as never before [for the new centre].

"How are we going to transform the hate into love and the suspicion into trust?" she asked. "The answer is education."

Shenhar said Haifa University has the largest percentage of Arab students and faculty of any Israeli university. The student population [which numbers over 11,000] is 20 per cent Arab, she said.

The university provides "a good example of co-existence," said Israeli Consul General Dror Zeigerman. He expressed the hope "that those students from the territories who study at Haifa University will take back the democratic principles and will participate in establishing democracy."

So does Ontario premier Bob Rae. "We celebrate tonight the cause of peace," he said, adding Ontario has much in common with Israel because both have multicultural, multi-racial societies.

Rae commended Stronach as a "true visionary" and a person who "builds things, makes things happen and who is prepared to invest and to work with people."

Stronach immigrated to Canada in 1954 from his native Austria. The one-man tool and die shop he opened in 1957 in a rented garage grew into a 12,000-employee public company which guaranteed a percentage of profits to every employee.

Stronach's success was threatened in 1990 when Magna faced a debt of $273.8 million. Under Stronach's leadership, the company has recovered and is now debt-free.

Financial Post editor Diane Francis noted in a video tribute that Stronach's "rags-to-riches to rags-to-riches" story is "rare and almost impossible, but he pulled it off."

"Frank Stronach is truly a great Canadian," said Ontario's Lieutenant-Governor Henry Jackman. "All of those jobs [at Magna] would not have been there at all had it not been for Frank Stronach."

Other speakers included Michael Feldman, national president of Canadian Friends of Haifa University, and Dennis Mills, MP for Broadview-Greenwood, a former Magna executive. Rabbi Gunther Plaut said the Hamotzi, and Marvin Rosenshein of Hamilton sang O Canada and Hatikvah. Bill Davis, former premier of Ontario, emceed the evening.

Memorial lecture held to honor Rabbi Steinberg

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Over 300 men, women, young people, rabbis and communal officials came together last week at B'nai Torah Synagogue in North York for the first annual memorial lecture for Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg, chaplain of Jewish Family & Child Services and of Mt. Sinai Hospital.

But they were also there to pay personal tribute to a much loved relative, friend, colleague and counsellor.

"I have no doubt," he said, "Reb Sholom is sitting in gan eden, smiling with humility, sorry you are troubled by having to come, embarrrassed by the great numbers, and greatly elevated by the kovod (respect and honor) you are paying to him."

Keynote speaker Rabbi Nacham Berlat, chaplain of Baycrest Centre and a close friend of Rabbi Steinberg, called him "an individual well-balanced in understanding and promulgation of Torah."

Jews must be strict about the observance of the mitzvot, he said, but we must also allow the spirit of those mitzvot to enrich our lives.

"It was in that spirit he reached out to the community."

The way to understand a society, Rabbi Berlat said in his lecture, is to see how it treats its underdogs, its poor, the alien, how it protects the rights of women and children.

The Torah, he said, obligates Jews to deal kindly and fairly with the less fortunate; to give charity, including that which "allows an individual to reconstruct his life and stand on his own feet," to be sensitive to the elderly and the disabled, to be concerned for the lonely.

Jews, he said, are obligated by the Torah to treat their employees well, and to always pay them at the end of the day, "because you never know how much in need he is." Similarly, a worker has an obligation "to give an honest day's work for an honest dollar."

The ketubah (Jewish marriage document) was one of the earliest documents in the world to protect the rights of women, he said.

And the Torah "doesn't tolerate abuse of a wife or a child. It is not acceptable — there is no discussion."

We must be accepting of the convert, and attentive to the needs of the baal teshuvah, giving them guidance, never taking advantage either of their lack of knowledge or of their eagerness to fully participate in Jewish ritual life, or "pointing a finger" about their past.

These Torah injunctions, Rabbi Berlat said, "are what makes a decent person, one who walks in G-d's ways."

Such a person is unable to let a wrong go unchallenged, or to stand idly by in the face of misfortune, persecution or tragedy.

A pure person, Rabbi Berlat said, has the ability to love each and every human being.

Rabbi Steinberg, he said, was a person who exemplified all these characteristics.

"His spirit is still with us. Although the year flew like a shadow, I still feel his warmth with me. I feel his presence wherever I walk. I see him, and feel him."

Yaakov Schechter, a friend and neighbor of the Steinberg family who has been saying kaddish for the rabbi, gave a d'var Torah.

Rabbi Steinberg, he said, didn't keep himself locked up in his books. "He went into the world [as head of Jewish Chaplaincy Services for Ontario] where divisiveness was — like jails — and brought peace to these situations."

The evening included Mincha and Ma'ariv services, conducted by synagogue member Pesach Forman.

The lecture was sponsored by Congregation B'nai Torah and by the Va'ad Harabonim of Toronto.

Endowment to aid Hebrew U

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A $500,000 endowment fund for research in the internal medicine division of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem will be inaugurated at a May 29 dinner for the Vancouver chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

The Vancouver community already funds 22 projects at the university.

The new fund, honoring Dr. Abraham Bogoch, a prominent Vancouver gastroenterologist and Jewish community leader, will remain in perpetuity with the interest providing two scholarships and research grants a year.

The dinner at the Fours Seasons Hotel will mark the 50th anniversary of the organization's founding by Allan Bronfman. Bogoch will receive the university's Scopus Award from Prof. Hanoch Gutfreund, president of the Hebrew University since 1993.

Guest speaker will be lawyer and author Alan Dershowitz, whose latest book, Chutzpah, chronicles his experiences as an American Jew.

The Scopus Award is the highest honor Friends of the Hebrew University can bestow. It is given to individuals "who have excelled in their chosen field and have demonstrated deep humanitarian concern throughout their careers."

The doctor's record of communal service encompasses both the Jewish and general communities, including the Vancouver Talmud Torah School, the local chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, State of Israel Bonds, the Hebrew Assistance Association and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Eitz Chaim principal lends expertise to foreign schools

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Between Purim and Pesach this year, Rabbi Shneur Weinberg, long-time senior principal of Eitz Chaim Schools, had a break from organizing curriculum, hiring teachers and dealing with students who like to pull the fire alarm.

For four weeks he served as educational consultant for day schools in Budapest, Kiev and Moscow, an experience he spoke to The CJN about with palpable excitement.

Rabbi Weinberg went to Eastern Europe on behalf of Torah Umesorah, the umbrella organization for religious day schools and Stolin B'nai Yisroel. The purpose was to assist with teacher training, curriculum development, and any other difficulties these fledgling institutions had.

The weeks were filled, he said, with workshops, seminars, teacher conferences, and even teaching some classes to students. As well, many administrators and staff took the opportunity to meet with him individually for guidance and practical assistance, on such matters as discipline and curriculum.

He wrote reports for each school, making recommendations in accordance with their budgets and philosophy.

Some were purely practical. In Moscow, for instance, some parents were balking at sending their children the long distance to the day school.

Rabbi Weinberg discovered that the school had religious services, and then served breakfast. The parents objected, they said, to their children not eating until late.

"I suggested they serve breakfast first — and the parents were happy.

"I found interesting differences betwen Jews in Hungary and those in what used to be the Soviet Union," he said.

In Hungary, he said, there were opportunities for those who wished to leave to do so, and brief periods when religious life was possible. Those remaining there, he said, don't want to leave. "They are satisfied to stay — they see themselves as Westernized and acculturated."

In Russia, however, he said, referring also to Ukraine, people are not observant because for 75 years they had absolutely no choice.

"There is an uneasy feeling there," he said. "People want to leave, and, if they find the opportunity, they do so."

Anti-Semitism is on the rise, there is economic insecurity (even though the cost of basic living is cheap) and political turmoil.

Rabbi Weinberg noted that he himself did not experience any problems, adding that he felt comfortable walking the streets, even at night, alone.

However, when he met with Rabbi Yankel Bleich, the Chief Rabbi of Ukraine, he discovered that a bodyguard was stationed half a floor below. And Rabbi Bleich insisted that the guard walk him back to his apartment.

There is a constant turnover of staff, especially in Moscow and Kiev, due to emigration. The teachers are young, often from Israel or North America. Because most do not speak very much Russian or Ukrainian (if any), and because most students speak little or no English or Hebrew, communication is often by means of interpreters.

There is not just a language gap, but a cultural one as well, Rabbi Weinberg said, not just in Russia and Ukraine, but in Hungary as well.

Local faculty, he said, are often baalei teshuvah (newly observant). Although they are eager and talented, they lack sufficient knowledge in religious subjects.

Some, he said, are being sent to Israel, Canada or to the United States for further education, and it is hoped that they will return.

While the schools Rabbi Weinberg went to were religious day schools, the students did not come from religious homes. In fact, he said, one of the joys of his trip was seeing youngsters learning to keep kosher and observe Shabbat.

Although he spent most of his time at the schools, he took a few hours to visit the tombs of the Baal Shem Tov, the Bratislaver and Berdichever rebbes, and to see Babi Yar.

"One of my strongest emotional moments was to see where 100,000 Jews were slaughtered, and then go back to the school and see the kids growing in Yiddishkeit.

"Jewish eternity is there, and all the Nazis and Communists couldn't destroy it. It's incredible to see and feel the renaissance and revival of the Jewish people."

Dairy delights part of Shavuot's culinary tradition

By LESLYE MICHLIN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

Shavuot joyously celebrates both the giving and receiving of the Ten Commandments at Mount Sinai, as well as the harvest of the first fruits. Like Passover and Rosh Hashanah, many food traditions surround it. Many Jewish people observe this important occasion by eating dairy foods.

LOWER FAT SMOKED SALMON CHEESECAKE IN THE STYLE OF EMERIL

Salmon:
1 lb. salmon fillet
salt and pepper to taste
Crust:
½ cup kosher Parmesan cheese, grated
1 cup unseasoned bread crumbs
4 tbsp. reduced fat margarine
Filling:
¼ cup vegetable stock
1 cup onion, finely chopped
½ cup red bell pepper, finely chopped
½ cup green bell pepper, finely chopped
24 oz. no-fat ricotta or cottage cheese
8 oz. low fat cream cheese (Neufchatel)
1 cup no-fat egg substitute
4 tbsp. flour
salt and pepper to taste
a few drops of liquid smoke (opt.)

Heat oven to 400 degrees.

Spray vegetable oil spray on a baking pan large enough to hold the salmon. Place the fillet in the prepared pan, skin side down. Season the top with salt and pepper. Roast, uncovered, for 15-20 minutes, depending on the thickness of the fish. A thicker fillet needs more cooking time. Cook until the fish flakes easily and its juices are an opaque white color. Remove the fish from the oven. Lower the oven temperature to 350 degrees.

While the salmon is cooking, prepare the crust. Spray vegetable oil spray on the bottom and sides of a 10-inch spring form pan. Combine the Parmesan cheese, bread crumbs, and margarine in a medium bowl. Mix well. Press onto the sides and bottom of the prepared pan. Bake for 10 minutes. Cool briefly. Refrigerate until ready to fill.

Prepare the filling. Heat the vegetable stock in a fry pan with a non-stick coating. Add the onions and peppers and cook over medium heat until the vegetables begin to give off their own liquid. Lower the heat and continue cooking until all the pan liquid evaporates. Turn off the heat and set aside.

In large bowl of electric mixer, blend the ricotta cheese, egg substitute, and flour. When the mixture is well combined, add the cooked onions and peppers. Remove the salmon from its skin and break into small pieces. Add it to the cheese mixture, beating at low speed until the ingredients are well combined. Season to taste with salt, pepper, and liquid smoke. Pour into the prepared crust. Smooth the top with a spatula.

Bake 1 hour, or until a sharp knife inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cool briefly on a wire rack. Refrigerate overnight, or at least 4 hours.

To serve, run a sharp knife around the edges of the pan. Remove the outer ring of the spring form pan. Place the cheesecake on an atractive serving platter. Save any crumbs from the crust. Garnish the top of the cake with these crumbs.

Makes 16 servings.

LOW FAT LIGHT AND "CREAMY" CHEESECAKE

Crust:
1 cup finely ground graham cracker crumbs (7 whole graham crackers)
3 tbsp. sugar
3 tbsp. reduced fat margarine, melted
OR ¾ tbsp. canola oil and 2¼ tbsp. water
Filling:
24 oz. no fat ricotta or cottage cheese
8 oz. light cream cheese
¾ cup sugar
¼ cup flour
¾ cup no fat egg substitute (equivalent to 3 eggs)
1½ tsp. vanilla
1 tbsp. grated orange rind (no white)
Topping:
1 cup no fat sour cream
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
Optional Garnish:
2 cups fresh strawberries, washed and halved

Heat oven to 350 degrees.

Place the crumbs and sugar in a 10-inch spring form pan. Mix well. Add the melted margarine (or oil and water) and stir with a fork, distributing the crumbs all around the bottom of the pan. Use the fork to press the crumbs against the sides and bottom to make a firm crust. Bake 10 minutes. Remove from oven and set aside.

Increase oven temperature to 450 degrees.

Combine the ricotta cheese and the cream cheese in the large bowl of your electric mixer. Blend well at medium speed. Add the sugar and flour. Continue beating and slowly pour in the egg mixture. Mix well. Stir in the vanilla and orange rind. Pour into the prepared crust. Bake 15 minutes. Turn the temperature down to 250 degrees and continue baking 1 hour. Remove from oven. Set aside to cool for 10 minutes.

In a small bowl, combine the topping ingredients. Spread evenly over the slightly cooled cheesecake. Refrigerate overnight, or at least 4 hours.

To serve, run a sharp knife around the edge of the pan. Remove the outer ring of the spring form pan. Arrange the strawberry halves on the top. Serve at once.

Serves 16.

Izzy Shopsowitz was part of Toronto's rich Jewish past

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For more than seven decades, the Shopsy name has been synonymous with the food industry. The recent death of Israel (Izzy) Shopsowitz at 71 brings to a close a chapter in Canadian history.

Patrons of the Shopsy's restaurant at the corner of Front and Yonge Streets, across the road from O'Keefe Centre, were greeted by the quiet-spoken and gentle man. He collapsed at the restaurant and later died of a heart attack at St. Michael's Hospital.

He was born on Spadina Avenue, just north of Dundas Street, in the flat over the ice cream shop operated by his parents, Jenny and Harry Shopsowitz. The store, which was opened in 1921, became a famous deli and a landmark in Toronto. Izzy and his brothers Sam and Dave helped in the family business from childhood, washing dishes, preparing sandwiches and learning all aspects of the food industry. He attened Ogden St. School and Harbord Collegiate.

In 1946, Sam and Izzy took over the family business. In 1969, the brothers went their separate ways and in 1972, the business was sold to Lever Brothers Ltd.

Izzy went on to open a chain of restaurants called Mr. I's. With his son Neil, he operated Caraway's in the Yorkdale Mall. In 1991, he returned to Shopsy's which had moved from Spadina to Front Street in 1983. He worked as a consultant and carried on the family tradition of personally greeting customers and longtime friends, many in the arts and the media.

Described by his friends as "a shy and thoughtful man," many expressed their shock and grief at his death. His son Neil explained his father had a heart attack seven months ago, and seemed to be recovering. Neil described his father as "the nicest, kindest, gentle man — an all-round wonderful man."

In an interview with the media, Frank Shuster, the surviving half of Canada's famed Wayne and Shuster comedy pair, said "Izzy was someone who was part of my birthplace, my heritage — and he was a big part of the Toronto tradition.

"Izzy was the last one of Toronto's old Jewish guard, and now he's gone. Now that's gone."

Gino Empry, who handled promotion for Shopsy's for many years, told The CJN that Izzy was one of the kindest, nicest men he ever met. "Mr. I. wasn't as flamboyant as Sam, but he was equally loved by all who met him. He didn't have a mean bone in his body and I shall never be able to forget what makes for a real nice, caring, thoughtful and generous human being. We could have taken lessons."

Izzy supported numerous groups including the Variety Club, the Hospital for Sick Children and Easter Seals.

Memorial service set for Rabbi Price

TORONTO —A memorial evening to honor the late Rabbi Abraham Price will be held Thursday, May 19, at 8 p.m. at Adath Israel Synagogue.

Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel, is organizing the event, along with Marvin Fox. Both are former students of Rabbi Price.

Rabbi Schild said he felt "a deep personal need" to arrange a memorial event for the man who taught him, ordained him as a rabbi, and rescued him when he was interned as an enemy alien during World War II.

"He was like a father to me. I am deep in his debt."

As well, Rabbi Schild said he couldn't make peace with the fact that only the Orthodox community was represented at his funeral.

"I want to give the general community an appreciation of the wonderful man we were privileged to have in our midst."

Ben Kayfetz, former executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and former national director of the Joint Community Relations Department of Canadian Jewish Congress, will talk about what the Toronto Jewish community was like when Rabbi Price came here in the late 1930s and his role in Jewish communal life.

Rabbi Schild will give the eulogy, and Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation will give a dvar Torah. Rabbi Steven Saltzman, spiritual leader of Adath Israel, will welcome the guests.

Book's rich details bring family's story to life

By JEFF ROSEN
CJN News Editor

TORONTO — Who doesn't fondly recall the stories our parents and grandparents recounted about how, in the face of hardship and oppression, they strived to build better lives for themselves in a new country?

Often these stories remained in a family as long as their source. Then suddenly the source of these wonderful tales was taken from them and the past would disappear.

The family of one woman, Goldie Grafstein, was determined that such a tragedy would not happen. For years they pressed her to write about her life, and the 99-year-old matriarch of the Grafstein clan has finally put her story into print in Just About Me. The book was co-ordinated and edited by her granddaughter Wendy Feldman.

The end result is quite enjoyable.

Despite the book's title, it's about not just Grafstein, but her entire family. It explores her past starting with parents Sarah Oppenheim and Michael Gollom, who were married in London, England, in 1893 and traces their families back to Germany and Russia, respectively.

Moving quickly from her parents' lives, Grafstein goes on to explore her own upbringing in Whitechapel. She was raised with her two sisters, Rose and Kate until, at age 15, her father allowed her to come to Toronto to live with family.

Goldie Grafstein in 1991.

"Well, here I was in Canada. That very first day my cousins walked me around the city. It looked to me like a big country, with so many farms. They took me to a huge store on Yonge Street, Eaton's. I never saw such a store before. We got into an elevator and rode to the seventh floor. One of my cousins brought me a big glass of buttermilk for two cents. I loved it."

Two years later she came face-to-face with the man she would spend the rest of her days with, when she joined her friends in taking dancing lessons from the school's teacher, Moishe Grafstein.

Two years after that they were married.

"I was Moishe's queen, and he treated me that way," said Grafstein, looking back on her life. "Even though I was left without my mother when I was very young, I did learn how to be a good Jewish wife and mother. I was so busy in the kitchen cooking and baking for my large family and the many guests my husband brought home."

Grafstein makes it very clear that she took great pride in raising her family. Becoming pregnant shortly after her marriage, she went on to raise eight girls and one boy.

The book is full of rich details of their lives as the family grew and prospered.

"I didn't leave the house very much because of my small children, but on Friday nights we went to the Jewish vaudeville show where we sat in the box seat on the right side of the theatre. Moishe always brought a box of cherry chocolates with him, which he would grandly pass around. We saw stars of the Yiddish theatre."

Throughout her biography, Grafstein describes her connections with a number of well-known Jewish personalities, including the Rasminskys, whose coat factory she went to work at soon after arriving in Toronto. Rasminsky's son Louis would go on to become Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Grafstein also mentions that her grandparents lived on Maria Street in the Junction, near a scrapyard belonging to a company called Runnymede, which was owned by Abraham Tanenbaum. His son Joseph would go on to become a prominent Toronto developer and his granddaughter would one day marry Grafstein's grandson, Robert Kaplan, a former Liberal solicitor general.

Her grandson was not the only politician in the family though, as Moishe's youngest brother Simcha had a son who is now Senator Jerry Grafstein.

As well as the rich details which make the history come alive, another aspect is more personal. For the Grafsteins' tale really did open a page on the past — my own.

As I was going over Grafstein's chronicle, the familiar names — many long-since departed — came flooding back, along with cherished memories of her sister Kate. It was this sister who went on to marry a Hamilton boy, David Rosen, and have three children of their own, one of whom was my father.

With her tale Grafstein has ensured that the doors to her past will never be closed.

Schindler's List author charms Toronto crowd

But delivers serious message

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The author of Schindler's List recently demonstrated superbly that besides being a good story teller he has a remarkable understanding of Jewish-Gentile tensions and of why Holocaust survivors have such a fear that the world will forget.

"You are a real mensch," is the way Jewish National Fund Toronto president Patricia Alpert described Thomas Keneally. The Australian author charmed a packed audience at the Pantages Theatre with his witty and insightful delivery.

Though not demeaning Oskar Schindler in any way, Keneally did say that if he knew then what he knows now about Schindler he would not have entered as "joyously" into writing the book.

Schindler's widow Emily is wrong in saying she was not consulted, he said. Conceding that Schindler's widow is "in a terrible situation because her husband deserted her in 1957," Keneally added, "I have extensive correspondence with her in which she answers questions posed by my lawyer after she said she was too ill for an interview. She didn't make any complaints until the film came out. At any rate, we're both speaking at a meeting in Florida next month and that should help clear the air.

"If the film did not have enough about her own heroic actions, it was the editing process, not through any malice on Steven Spielberg's part." The author recalled that Emily personally fed a woman with a special bland diet to keep her alive.

He believes Spielberg erred in the final scene of the film, where Schindler breaks down and cries because he could have saved many more Jews. "The survivors have told me that Schindler was at the limit of the number he could save and he knew it."

A jovial man with white hair and a goatee, Keneally nevertheless delivered a serious message, saying it is nonsense to blame the Hebron massacre on feelings inflamed by emphasis on the Holocaust, and warning both Jews and Gentiles not to "blinker" themselves into thinking that "Israel does not concern us because it is away off there some place."

Holocaust deniers can draw no comfort from the fact that Schindler's List is under the fiction category in libraries, Keneally said, because he has authentic documentation, including a 21-page tightly-written, single space report written by Schindler for the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the contents of which were confirmed by survivors.

"As for Holocaust deniers they wouldn't believe it if it was confirmed by the Pope, the Chief Rabbi of Israel and Julia Roberts," he said.

To Keneally, Schindler was a "flawed man," who failed miserably in business after the war because it held no thrills from black marketing and chicanery as did his exploits with the Nazis. "He just wanted the fun, or as one survivor put it, 'He wanted his Mercedes and the Jews.' "

The Australian author is convinced that once Schindler learned about the extermination of Jews, he became a changed man and journeyed at great personal risk to Budapest, and perhaps to Istanbul, to let the JDC know what was happening. "Schindler never bought into the idea that the Jews were alien to Europe and should be got rid of."

The calumny heaped on Hollywood as a place run by Jews, "is a classical example of anti-Semitism," Keneally said. "If it is run by Jews why did it take 50 years for Schindler's List to be made, and why was it so timidly released?"

He said Spielberg's movie was the "kiss of life" for the book written in 1982, which was lagging in sales.

He spiced his talk with numerous anecdotes about Leopold Page (Poldeck) of Los Angeles, a Schindler survivor who first told him about the German's exploits.

"When we were in Poland, trying to get permission to film things, Poldeck would tell the Polish officials, 'You're just the type we need in the movie, you've got the right Slavic features, give us your name and address.' There are still many Poles waiting to be called for the movie."

The first time they met Spielberg, Poldeck took Keneally aside, muttering, "He grosses $2 million. Why is he wearing sneakers?" Keneally said Poldeck struck fear into Spielberg's heart by saying, "I was just talking to your mother." It was Poldeck's persistence which finally resulted in the film being made, and he is a real hero, the author said.

When a man in the audience said Poldeck wanted Keneally to be awarded the Nobel prize for literature, the author quickly replied, "Thanks, but I think my luck has run out."

A survivor who forged Schindler's documents so he could travel to Budapest is now a judge on the Israeli Supreme Court, Keneally said.

Though he once got a death threat by fax over his efforts to separate Australia from the monarchy, Keneally said he had little or no hate mail and no letter bombs after he wrote Schindler's List."I get the odd phone call where someone says, 'You and the Jews stink like dogs,' and hangs up, stuff like that."

Nathan Disenhouse and Stephen Karr, of the New Leadership Division, which sponsored Keneally's visit, were co-chairs.

BGU Associates completes its 'most successful year ever'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto chapter of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) marked its "most successful year ever," said chapter president Paul Jacobs at the organization's annual meeting held recently at the Primrose Club.

Its income of $1.245 million for the year ending Sept. 30, 1993, exceeded its budget of $1.125 million by almost 11 per cent, Jacobs noted. Accounts receivable indicating rising pledges totalled $3 million.

In the past six months, said Jacobs, the chapter has had an income of $680,000 with a budget of $468,000 representing a 45 per cent surplus of income over budget.

Paul Jacobs was re-elected as president of the Toronto chapter for a second year. Valerie Fine and Robert Goldberg were re-elected as vice-presidents; Nani Beutel and Carey Diamond were elected vice-presidents, and Ed Merkur and Henry Goldbach were elected treasurer and secretary respectively.

Past president Aly Larson presented certificates to new "founders" (donors of at least $25,000) including Dov and Ruth Gilad. Gerda Frieberg was presented with a gold pen in honor of having established a chair in agricultural water management.

Eliezer Oren

BGU professor Eliezer Oren, incumbent in the Canada Chair in Near Eastern Archaeology, spoke of his findings at the Tel Haror site over the past decade. The site, located in the Negev, dates back to biblical times, and is criss-crossed with military trenches from World War I, when it served as "one of the major Turkish-German defence points or part of a defence system meant to stop the British advancing from Egypt to Gaza."

Tel Haror "no doubt [was] the largest Canaanite and later Philistine Israelite city-state in southern Israel," said Oren. Known as the Land of Gerar project, the BGU excavation is "clearly one of the more exciting windows opening into the ancient civilization of the region."

The 140-acre site, encircled by a system of ramparts, "was a magnet of an area" settled by the tribe of Simeon to seek pasture for their flock, he said.

A particularly interesting find at Tel Haror consists of the remnants of a thick-walled Canaanite temple. It still contains narrow benches (on which to place offerings) and an altar.

"We know so little about the Canaanite culture," said Oren, adding the Israelites were warned against practising Canaanite religions.

The temple also housed repositories filled with animal bones, mainly puppies, from sacrifices. The animals were not eaten, because there were no cut-marks on the bones, and dogs were a symbol of healing in Mesapotamia. No human sacrifices were found.

Snake symbols and donkey skulls were also unearthed, along with a horse bit. "In the ancient Near East, one of the unsolved questions is, 'At what stage was the horse introduced as a practical beast of burden'?" Oren said. He said the Middle Bronze Age bit dates from a transitional time, when donkeys were still being used as beasts of burden and horses had just begun playing that role.

Bais Yaakov Elementary School celebrates its 25th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Banks of flowers surrounded with greenery and decorated watering cans highlighted the theme of the 25th anniversary dinner of Bais Yaakov Elementary School.

Just as a seed, when nurtured, becomes a flower, so too, it was explained, a tiny school of only 30 young girls has grown into an institution with some 500 students on two campuses.

The dinner, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph congregation in Thornhill, paid tribute to three founding families, Samuel and Renee Reichmann, Max and Sally Walerstein and Jack and Anne Weinbaum, as well as the late Yisroel Simon, one of the original parents, who was for many years active on the board of directors and the tuition and finance committees.

Master of ceremonies Shaya Weiss, whose wife was in the first class, noted that the motto of the school is "when you educate a girl, you educate a family."

Bais Yaakov graduates, he said, will create homes filled with Torah, tzedakah (charity) and loving kindness, where parents learning with their children is part of regular family life.

Dayan Chanoch Ehrentreu, head of the London, England Beth Din and rosh kollel of Kollel Bais Yisroel and spiritual leader of Bais Medrash Bais Yisroel in Hendon, was the keynote speaker.

He praised the honorees as people having a vision for the community, who are willing to put in the effort to turn their dreams into reality.

He said people don't always realize what they are doing will have an important impact on the future.

Genuine permanence "does not exist in the the physical world. Eternity is in the realm of the spiritual — and Torah is the spiritual world."

When the Reichmanns, Walersteins and Weinbaums helped found Bais Yaakov, a school based on Torah values, he said, "they were creating eternity."

Simon was praised by Philip Weitz, also a volunteer worker for the school, as a modest, gentle and committed man, who recognized that his success came from G-d. His son, Rabbi Yosef Zalman Simon, who accepted the commemorative plaque on behalf of his family, said when he and his siblings would sit down in the evening to do homework, his father sat down with his — which was work for Bais Yaakov.

Rabbi Yaakov Felder, spiritual leader of Shomrai Shabbes Congregation, the synagogue of the Weinbaum and Walerstein families, praised them as examples of "ahavas chesed — charity, love and kindness.

"They are soldiers, generals, in the army [of righteousness], who understand that we must extend ourselves to enable our young children to be educated in an atmosphere conducive to Torah and Yiddishkeit."

Besides the plaques presented to Max Walerstein and Jack Weinbaum, bouquets of flowers were presented to Sally Walerstein and Anne Weinbaum by school principals Millicent Drebin and Magda Simon.

Allen Weinbaum thanked the school on behalf of both families.

Cantorial selections were presented by Chazaan Chaim Weiner, cantor of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

Irv Ungerman to be honored

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Longtime boxing promoter and philanthropist Irving Ungerman has been chosen as honoree for the 43rd annual Humanitarian Award Dinner of the Beth Sholom Synagogue Brotherhood.

Ungerman joins an impressive list of past award recipients which includes figures such as last year's winner, Ed Mirvish, and John Turner, Monty Hall, Maxwell Cohen, Tommy Douglas and Lincoln Alexander.

"Ungerman has a record that speaks for itself," said Norm Talsky, president of the synagogue. "We felt he is a mover not just in the Jewish community but in the non-Jewish community and he's a worthwhile recipient."

Perhaps best known as a boxing promoter and as manager for former Canadian heavyweight champion George Chuvalo, Ungerman has also been a longtime supporter of the Maccabi sports movement. The Reena Foundation Sports Complex is named in his honor as is a Maccabi resource centre at the North branch of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

Ungerman was the first inductee into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame in 1973, and earlier this year he became the first Canadian named to the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Israel. In 1990 he was named JCC sportsman of the year.

Ungerman's community activities include board positions with the Mount Sinai Hospital and the Shaare Zedek Hospital in Israel. He also devotes time to promote the Variety Village and serves as director of the Santa Claus Parade; in 1984 he received the North York Humanitarian Award.

This year's dinner is scheduled for Tuesday June 7.

With 550 guests expected this year, the brotherhood hopes to raise a substantial sum which will be donated to a charity yet to be named, Talsky said.

Serge Koussevitzsky's Music Shed at Tanglewood

Tanglewood charms music lovers

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

LENOX, Mass. — Boasting the presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood has remained one of the pre-eminent American summer music festivals for over 50 years, surpassing the Philadelphia Orchestra in Saratoga, N.Y., and the Blossom Concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra in Ohio.

The Tanglewood region — just 90 miles from Albany, N.Y. — offers charm, grace, tradition and above all magnificent music amidst the serene beauty of the Berkshire Hills.

Each summer, 350,000 listeners flock to the 5,000-seat Serge Koussevitzky Music Shed to hear symphonic and chamber offerings by one of the world's great orchestras. Many also come for picnics on the 500-acre manicured lawn.

This season's highlight will be the July 7 opening of the $10-million Chamber Concert Hall, with seating for 1,200. It is the first new facility at Tanglewood in over 50 years.

The Boston Symphony, under music director Seiji Ozawa, will welcome Leon Fisher, Yo-Yo Ma, Jessye Norman, Peter Serkin and the Juilliard String Quartet, John Williams and the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Music Centre Orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Other outstanding soloists during the seven-week season are Emmanuel Ax, Joshua Bell, Alicia de Larrocha, Itzhak Perlman, Andre Watts and Midori. On the roster of distinguished Tanglewood conductors are Andre Previn and Leonard Slatkin.

In this culturally rich area balletomanes can attend the dance festival at Jacob's Pillow. The nearby Williamstown Theatre and the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge are amongst the most distinguished summer theatres in the country.

For a Tanglewood brochure with complete programs and information on how to order tickets write: Tanglewood Brochure, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115, or call (617) 266-1492. For information concerning accommodation call Lenox Chamber of Commerce (413) 637-3646. Bring your sweaters — it can get quite chilly at night.

Guide book offers the basics

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

For more than half a century now, the Jewish Travel Guide has accompanied Jewish travellers around the world.

Though it was never a comprehensive compendium, it could be relied upon for the basics — addresses, phone numbers, and the like.

As a rule, you did not consult the Jewish Travel Guide to gain an understanding of the historical underpinnings of this or that Jewish community. You perused it to find the address, and perhaps the telephone number, of a synagogue, a hotel, a kosher restaurant, an organization or a club. The Jewish Travel Guide had no pretentions to greatness.

The 1994 edition, edited by Stephen Massil, is much the same. It has been enlarged, with slightly more background information. But essentially, it remains what is has always been — a simple nuts-and-bolts directory.

Being a British publication, the Jewish Travel Guide leads off with Britain, followed by Israel and the United States. You'll have to plough through 211 pages, or more than half the book, before you reach other countries, ranging from Afghanistan to Zimbabwe.

The section on Canada is 14 pages long and is, as expected, relatively skimpy. Even by its own modest standards, the chapter on former Soviet republics is threadbare, and therefore, badly in need of revision. Hungary, with the largest Jewish community in the former East bloc, is dismissed, in about one page. Argentina, whose community is not much bigger, receives proportionately better treatment.

Published by Valentine, Mitchell & Co., the Jewish Travel Guide is distributed in North America by Sepher-Hermon Press, 1265 46th Street, Brooklyn. It retails for $11.95 (US).

There is no shortage of guides about Israel, but Lonely Planet's version, Israel: a travel survival kit (Raincoast Books, $21.95), stands out as one of the finest.

Neil Tilbury's guide doesn't miss a beat. He delves into Israel's history, geography and economy. He describes its cultural, religious and political dimensions.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Extraordinary Collection of Judaica: In the early years of this century, U.S. Judge Mayer Sulzberger donated 26 objects of Judaica to the Jewish Theological Seminary of America and suggested the formation of a museum. The result is Manhattan's Jewish Museum, which marks its 90th anniversary this year. Situated at Fifth Avenue and 92nd Street, the Jewish Museum is the showplace for the world's largest collection of Judaica, with more than 27,000 paintings, sculptures, photographs, antiquities, coins and other objects.

The museum is housed in the Warburg mansion, a landmark building styled as a French Renaissance gothic chateau. It has just emerged from a major renovation that has doubled its gallery space. "Now we have room for our new permanent exhibition on the Jewish experience on the fourth and third floors, and also two other floors for changing exhibitions," says publicity director Anne Scher.

Highlighting 4,000 years of Jewish history, the permanent exhibition traces the journey of the Jewish people from Biblical times to the present. Entitled Culture and Continuity: the Jewish Journey, its four sections (Forging an Identity, Interpreting a Tradition, Confronting Modernity, Realizing a Future) are spread over 17 galleries. Unique and irreplaceable artifacts include a Torah ark from the Urbino Synagogue dating from 1551, and items from 10 crates of communal property from Danzig, sold to raise funds for emigration in 1939. Also on view are a one-third scale replica of the Western Wall, treasures from ancient synagogues, textiles, paintings, ceremonial objects and interactive computer and audio-visual exhibits.

"We're living in a time when Jewish people feel very comfortable with claiming their identity as Jews, yet there are fewer and fewer people both Jewish and not who are knowledgeable about what it means to be a Jew," says museum director Joan Rosenbaum. "This is what the permanent exhibit is meant to address. It answers the question, 'Why have Jews lasted so long?' "

Beyond its display space, the Jewish Museum features the innovative and kosher Cafe Weissman, educational facilities funded by Edgar Bronfman, and a museum shop with a wide selection of wares. The museum is open Sunday, Monday, Wednesday and Thursday, 11 a.m. to 5:45 p.m., and Tuesday 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. Adult admission is $6, except Tuesday after 5 p.m., when a pay- what-you-wish policy is in effect.

Tenement Museum

Tenement Museum: A tenement building at 97 Orchard St. on New York's Lower East Side, whose upper floors were vacated and closed off around 1930, may be the only surviving example of a unretouched 19th-century tenement house. Built in 1863, its floors and dark hallways resonate with ghosts and history. Listed on the National Register of Historic Places, the building enshrines many typical apartment dwellings of New York's "urban pioneers" of many backgrounds: Jewish, Italian, Dutch, African, Portuguese, Chinese.

Since 1988, the building has been home to the Lower East Side Tenement Museum. Last summer, the museum's urban archeologists found more than 1,500 objects under floorboards, on cabinet shelves, between cracks and crevices and in the backyard dirt outside the six-story building. Many of these objects are on view, as is a scale model of 97 Orchard St., showing cutaways of apartments with actual families that once lived here.

Museum tours, walking tours of the Lower East Side, and various exhibits and programs are offered. For a brochure or further information, write 66 Allen St., New York City 10002. Telephone 212-431-0233, fax 212-431-0402.

For The Jewish Armchair Traveller: Many North American Jews yearn to learn more about their ancestors and of the shtetlach where they lived two, three, four and more generations ago. Numerous travel agents and book publishers now cater to this strong demand for Jewish heritage travel. But one must generally step aboard a jumbo jet before walking in the footsteps of those who went before. For those on a modest budget, library books are far more accessible.

More than 800 yizkor (remembrance) books have been published that detail the colorful histories of nearly as many Jewish communities across Eastern Europe, most of which were destroyed half a century ago. The best source for yizkor books in Canada is Toronto's Robarts Library, with close to 500 titles on its shelves. Knowledge of Hebrew or Yiddish is usually required. (For a sampling of yizkor books in translation, see From A Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry, edited and translated by Jack Kugelmass and Jonathan Boyarin.)

The Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, which has published a comprehensive list of yizkor books found in Canadian libraries, recently made a donation to Robarts which allowed for the acquisition of 15 more titles. The books refer to these towns and areas: Antopol, Bialobrzegi, Brzesko, Dusetos, Gorlice, Krasnobrod, Lodz, Ludwipol, Stoczek Wegrowski, Szczucyn, Wasiliszki, Wislica, Wolbrom, Yurburg and Zdunskah Wola.

Now! Health insurance for your appliances. Why take chances?

For ten years, Southern Atlantic Appliance Service has been providing a unique form of insurance to both home and condominium owners in Ontario. Robert and Errol Gordon founded the company in April of 1984, basing their idea on one which had been very successful in Florida for many years: a single insurance package for all makes and models of appliances. Until the father and son opened their business, no company in Toronto was offering such a package.

The Southern Atlantic Service Protection Plan works like other kinds of insurance. You avoid major repair bills and assure yourself of fast, dependable service by factory-trained technicians at no additional cost to you. For as little as $99.00 a year for five major appliances, or pennies a day you can protect yourself against the high cost of repairs.

The Southern Atlantic Protection Plan covers all parts and labour required for maintaining the insured appliances in good operating condition. There is no limit to the number of repairs; and there are no charges for trips or pick-ups. You are guaranteed service within 24 hours of your call. Often, however, a technician will visit you on the same day.

Southern Atlantic technicians service any brand or model of appliance, so that no matter what makes you own, the one call to Southern is the only one you need to make. Southern Atlantic has also been authorized by Sub Zero, Thermador and other manufacturers to do warranty service. The company's technicians regularly attend schooling seminars in order to keep up with new technology in the appliance industry, and maintain their skills and efficiency at a high level. For non-members, Southern will make C.O.D. calls.

During the last few years, Southern Atlantic has expanded it's business to meet the needs of both their clients and the public by carrying a full line of top quality water filters for those concerned with maintaining the purity of their drinking water.

Southern Atlantic Appliance Service is a 100% Canadian-owned company, and member of the Better Business Bureau. In order to apply for your "Easy Peace of Mind" Protection Plan, don't hesitate to call: (905) 738-4076.

Boris Freesman has spent over 28 years as a lawyer, mainly in the courtroom, and in private practice, both as partner and sole practitioner. Because he no longer believes in the adversary system, where parties enter into a conflict which one must lose, he has been working for the past two years as a conciliator and mediator.

He tries to reach agreements through negotiation, and sees his job as "keeping people out of the courts". Rather than help one party win while the other loses, he tries to put his client in a "win-win situation" where both gain. He quotes Mahatma Gandhi, who was himself a lawyer:

"I had learned . . . to find the better side of human nature, and to enter men's hearts. I realized that the true function of a lawyer was to unite parties driven asunder."

Freesman, after over 15 years' thinking about how to implement this ideal, quotes Abba Eban's maxim that "each party can accept a compromise from a third party that it could never accept from its adversary or initiate itself." Successful negotiation requires a party who is not emotionally involved with the others.

In adversarial bargaining, parties try to one-up one another. They are afraid to lose face by giving ground easily; also, they come to enjoy the fight itself, and actually want it to continue. Rather than resolve conflicts, this system may exacerbate them.

A conciliator wants to resolve a dispute, not win it. Rather than take an adversarial position, he considers the interests of every party, which are usually compatible. Rather than score points, he speaks openly with everyone, to define issues and clarify ambiguities. He makes sure every party has a fair hearing, and gets them to speak openly with each other. Catharsis is part of conciliation; it relieves emotional pressure, and improves understanding among the parties.

While each lawyer in the adversary system must retain an expert in any relevant field, a conciliator retains one expert in any area. The experts are more objective because they are not obligated to a disputant. Thus, conciliation is more solidly based in fact and less expensive than the adversary system.

Freesman concurs with the observation that conciliation is a form of counselling, and thinks it will be more important in future. At the same time, he links it to Jewish legal traditions which value conciliation. There is no guarantee it will work; but it will succeed when each party, no matter how angry at the others, wants a resolution more than a victory.

ARE YOU ABOUT TO BE SUED?

ARE YOU ABOUT TO SUE SOMEBODY?

Before you take that fateful next step, listen to what Abba Eban has to say:

"It is a law of negotiation that each party can accept a compromise from a third party that it could never accept from its adversary or initiate itself."

I am that third party: I use my experience as a lawyer and skills as a facilitator to mediate, conciliate or help you negotiate a solution to your dispute.

It's time to create better living space

Ever wished your home backed onto a golf course? Ever hoped you could see the lush rolling green expanse of a fairway from your office window?

Renovations can give you the kind of qualitatively different ambience you'd really like to have — a livelier feeling to your home; an open, airier office environment for your employees; or a beautiful recreational property that truly meshes with the natural setting.

Kirsch Construction specializes in "opening up" properties to create a lighter, airier feeling that ties in the building to its natural environment. Many Ontario properties "fight" sunlight and the view, and tend to box people into tight, mood-dampening space.

Kirsch Construction is headed by innovative partners Steven Kirsch and Mark Cowan. Kirsch grew up in Toronto and honed his renovation sense in the American southwest — La Jolla California, Sedona Arizona, and Rosarita Mexico. There he learned to see greater possibilities for making properties much more a part of the land on which it sets — to capture sunlight and to relate rooms to gardens, trees and outdoor vistas. He developed a sense of hew to use warm, rich materials and textures inside to create a different feeling that can help perk up the mood.

Captures the right mood

Kirsch worked on projects with world famous golf course designer Joe Lee who designed three of the courses on the PGA tour. He also worked with Jack Bevash of Bevash and Associates of La Jolla on the development of a magnificent residential golf course community in Rancho Santa Fe, California. Along the way he has remodelled countless kitchens, bathrooms, basements, family and living rooms, home offices and multimedia rooms, and converted mansions into luxury condo units.

Kirsch's partner, Mark Cowan, comes from the fashion industry, and he brings a superb eye for color, texture and fabric to create a warm, rich interior. Together they bring a unique perspective to construction.

Together they are already involved in a number of exciting projects that help transform the landscape — from developing plans for a new world-class aquarium, pioneering the "wall-less hospital" (including everything form birthing centers, sports medicine facilities, cosmetic surgery clinics), to redeveloping Toronto's downtown fashion district where Cowan's family has been active for over 50 years.

They'd be pleased to show you how they could renovate your property — whether residential, industrial, redevelopment or recreational — to help give you a truly different ambience. Who knows, maybe with their different "eye" on construction, they could create the golf and country club feeling in your home or office.

Sightseeing flights from $19.99!

Kelvin Wayne, his wife Hazel and his brother Clive have started a new company, Kel-Air Flying Services, operating sightseeing, charter and cargo flights out of Buttonville airport.

Their most romantic sightseeing specialty is champagne flights for couples. If two couples go, a flight of about one half-hour over the Toronto Skyline at sunset costs $59.99 per couple: a flight over Niagara Falls, lasting about three-quarters of an hour, $84.99 per couple; and a one-hour combination flight costs $109.99 per couple. Prices include everything but the GST: champagne, a rose for the lady, and a Polaroid photograph of the couple as a memento of the flight.

Regular sightseeing starts at $19.99 per person for the Toronto skyline, $29.99 for Niagara Falls, and $39.99 for the combination. Flights can go elsewhere, for example, to see the cottage or the farm from the air or the colors of the leaves in autumn, though they can not land. If the Skydome is open, it is possible to look down into it and watch the Jays play.

Kelvin is a pilot himself. On one occasion, he came to the aid of a model airplane enthusiast who had lost his remote control craft in the Scarborough Bluffs area. It had crashed among the trees, and could not be seen from the ground; they were able to locate it from the air.

Their aircraft, a five-passenger Piper Cherokee 6, cruises at 165 miles per hour, but can slow to 120. Flights over Toronto are at 2,400 feet, over Niagara Falls at 3,500; these speeds and altitudes are ideal for taking photographs. (The CN Tower is 1,800 feet tall.) There are comfortable velour seats with plenty of leg room: the cabin is roomy and airy, with wide windows.

Business charters are available for $199.00 per hour, with a two-hour minimum per day. Within 500 nautical miles or two and one-half hours' flying time, this rate is mor economical than regular commercial flights. Also, Buttonville is only about 15 minutes' drive from Bathurst and Steeles, with no parking fees, and no red tape before boarding.

Kel-Air issues gift certificates. As the weather improves, the idea of a sightseeing flight as a gift becomes more appealing. The client can purchase a certificate, then either present it in person or have Kelvin send it as a surprise.

For more information please call Kelvin Wayne at (905) 415-0767.

Hadassah-WIZO joins breast cancer battle

Breast cancer directly affects many women and impacts on their families. And women, families and health are issues for which Hadassah-WIZO is renowned worldwide.

So it's a natural step for Toronto Hadassah-WIZO to join forces with Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation in presenting an educational symposium Thursday, June 9 at Beth Sholom Synagogue entitled "Breast Cancer — The Up Side."

Ronnie Richman, Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation's special projects co-ordinator, says it's important women are aware there is an up side to breast cancer that is often not discussed.

Hampson keynote speaker

"There are a lot of survivors out there. We try to have a survivor at every education event because people can relate better if they see someone who admits to having had breast cancer," Richman says.

Sharon Grossman, co-chair with Renée Wolfe of Hadassah-WIZO's symposium committee, announces the keynote speaker is breast cancer survivor Sharon Hampson of Sharon, Lois and Bram.

Medical panelists are radiation oncologist Dr. Roy M. Clark, reconstruction surgeon Dr. John L. Semple and research dietitian Mary Cousins. A breast cancer screening booth and information pamphlets will be available in the lobby.

Wolfe notes that "the purpose of this symposium is not to raise funds but to educate women about an important issue that touches us all. Our sponsor, Pharma Plus, shares our commitment. We welcome its support and generosity."

Richman says the partnership with Toronto Hadassah-WIZO "is a fabulous opportunity for our national foundation.

Enhances relationship

"We hope to do these events across Canada. It's a way of reaching women in cities where we don't have chapters."

Grossman says, "Sponsorship of an awareness night that is completely open to the public enhances our relationship with the community by giving women the opportunity to be better informed about this disease. It's just an extention of our educational programming."

All gain, no pain at Growing Pains

Pssst! There's a special shop on Bathurst Street that has a sure cure for growing pains. Step inside its doors, and your children's growing pains will begin to ease noticeably. Have them slip into that special bat mitzvah dress or bar mitzvah suit, and the pains will vanish completely.

The shop, ironically named Growing Pains, has been performing this type of sartorial magic (in sizes 0-20) for eight years. Under the watchful eye of owners J.D. Leiner and Myriam Reichman, the shop has sailed through its own "childhood" relatively pain-free by satisfying its customers with a fabulous selection of outfits from dressy to casual. Its mainstay is special occasion wear for the high holidays, bar/bat mitzvahs, and other special events.

J.D. and Myriam travel twice yearly to France, Italy, and Belgium to buy for the shop, and import many lines directly and exclusively. You won't find ten of this and twenty of that; what you will find is a marvellous cross-section of enticing pieces. If you're looking for a special outfit, it's sure to be here.

Unusual service

Growing Pains also carries a number of high-quality domestic lines that are slightly easier on the budget without sacrificing style. J.D. and Myriam also provide an unusual "service" that many shops don't: if you've purchased an outfit from them, they'll do their best not to sell the same outfit to someone else whose child might be attending the same party or shul. "We've gotten to know our customers pretty well", says Myriam, "so we try to avoid embarrassing situations wherever possible. Sometimes the best sales are the ones we don't make".

Spring spectacular

Obviously, they make enough sales to keep a legion of parents kvelling over their well-dressed children. Spring is no exception, with a wide range of offerings guaranteed to make your child as presentable or compelling as the occasion dictates. The natural look is strong, with plenty of earth tones in linens and silks. Navy and white are ongoing favourites, and a number of lovely floral prints are also in evidence.

Dress shirts and dressy blouses are a speciality, and are available in several styles and sizes to ensure a proper fit. A selection of outerwear will help combat the April showers that overstay their leave well into May and beyond.

On May 12 and 13, the store is holding a special pre-Shavuot "three-for-two" sale: buy two items and get a third item free (details below).

With the right spring/summer merchandise at the right price, Growing Pains offers an all-gain, no-pain shopping experience.

Palazzetti pieces stunning and varied

If you're a person who wants every piece of furniture in your home to possess its own unique character, a visit to Palazzetti may be extremely rewarding.

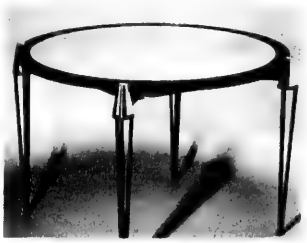
So eclectic is the variety of pieces, that you simply can't "breeze through" the showroom – nor would you want to. Each piece tells its own design story and warrants a close look.

With its origins in Italy and a 15-year history in the U.S. (New York, L.A., Philadelphia and Dallas), Palazzetti is well-known throughout the design world for its original pieces and reproductions of modern classics. Since opening its new showroom in the Taps building at 1020 Lawrence Avenue West, Palazzetti has attracted a large number of "destination" shoppers seeking not so much to furnish an entire home (though co-owner Fabia Sadoch can and does accommodate such requests) as to find that one elusive piece that will finish off a room in style.

The round "Baloo" table by Daniel Aberg (1992, pictured opposite) features a tan-coloured top of bird's-eye maple with rosewood perimeter trim and triad steel rod legs. The table can be custom-made in many shapes and sizes.

An inviting sofa with soft flowing lines, warmly finished in rust ultrasuede (Jean Michel Frank, 1930) is available as a two- or three-seater, with or without a matching armchair. As with many Palazzetti pieces, finishes can be custom ordered to suit your taste.

Handcrafted designer area rugs are a highlight. Recipient of the prestigious Roscoe Award for creative product design, Eileen Gray's Marine d'abord recreates a seascape, while Vantongerloo's Stijl is reminiscent of Mondrian, with whom he helped found the "de Stijl" school. These are pieces to look up to (wall-mounted) or down to (underfoot) with equal reverence. In fact, says Sadoch, area rugs are now considered so important to a home's overall decor that the rug is often the first piece chosen, with the remaining pieces selected accordingly.



Other area rugs by Gray, Josef Hoffman and Ferdinand Léger are available in the Art Deco collection. Palazzetti also distributes the Avant-Garde Russia and Massimo Iosa-Ghini collections.

Interesting accent pieces abound, from Silvio Russo's "Palle" tables with their three-dimensional inlays to the enigmatic Fornasetti ceramic dinner plates that are an affordable collector's item.

The fact that it's a world-class store shouldn't discourage casual buyers. The prices are not unreasonable for this level of quality, and will give you many years of pleasure. They also make ideal wedding and anniversary gifts.

Israel's future depends on her children

Na'amat's Adopt-A-Child Campaign for Day Care was created to ensure that as many of Israel's children as possible would get the head start that is so necessary for the achievement of a successful future.

Each day, in Na'amat day care centres across Israel, thousands of toddlers from Russia, Rumania, Ethiopia, Argentina join with more than 25,000 little Sabras to learn life's first lessons. Lessons that they must learn if they are to grow up with self esteem.

Children of deprived families often lack the pre-school mental stimulation that they must have if they are to succeed in school. School failure can be their first step to becoming second class citizens — and Israel cannot afford to have second class citizens.

Even for pre-schoolers who are not from disadvantaged families, day care is a vital need. Almost all young families in Israel have mortgages. Parents must often choose — to live in below-standard living quarters or to neglect their children while they both work. It would be better if they had the choice of sending the children into the loving arms of Na'amat.

So for those working parents, form immigrants and for the disadvantaged who cannot afford the full cost of child care, there must be subsidies. It is the aim of Na'amat Canada's present Adopt-A-Child campaign to raise funds to provide as many children as possible with Na'amat's day care — for the sake of Israel's future.

"MANKIND OWES TO THE CHILD THE BEST IT HAS TO GIVE"

Whether a child has been rescued from a distant country and is living in a strange new land, or comes from within that land and is living in an overcrowded home, with parents who may be unable to provide a decent life — that child is equal in worth to one who is born into the most fortunate circumstances.

Children whose minds and bodies are not properly nurtured in their formative years are destined to become tomorrow's underachievers. Given loving attention and sensitive care, they can grow into happy, productive adults.

In 837 day care classes in Israel, Na'amat cares for 25,000 pre-school children, in an environment with no language differences, no colour barriers and no doubts about each child's value in this world.

A gift of $400 for one year's care will make you the Spiritual Parent of one of these precious children.

Unique promises to meet or beat competitors' prices

Not content to sit on their laurels as the "in" spot for unisex denim and casual wear, the Unique Stockroom is now making a unique offer: they'll meet or beat their competitors' prices on any item Unique has in stock. Just bring in your receipt for the identical item purchased at any other store within the previous two months, and Unique will meet or beat it. They'll also meet or beat any competitor's advertised price within two months before or after the ad date, provided Unique has the identical item in stock.

The offer is part of Unique's ongoing commitment to provide (as stated on their business card) "Creative Quality Clothing for Men and Women at Unique Prices". "We stand behind our products, our quality and our prices," says Derek Rea. "When we advertise something, we mean business; we're not just paying lip service. There are a lot of so-called 'fashion outlet' stores out there advertising low prices, and when consumers check them out they're usually disappointed with both the quality and the prices. At Unique we give them high quality and affordable prices, plus personal service by knowledgeable salespeople."

Tanks & "Ts" $5 & $6

Unique has an in-store Levi's boutique that offers a full range of Levi's merchandise for men and women at Unique prices.

For spring/summer, Unique is offering an expanded collection of ladies' casual wear, with everything from basic blouses to tights and shorts. Body suits are flying out the door at $9.98 (reg. $25-30), as are chambray wrap skirts, also priced at $9.98. Assorted tops start at $3.98.

Guys can "leg it out" with Point Zero bermuda shorts in assorted colours at $16.98, and "top it off" with a selection of Mexx tops, polos, and "T"s, now 25% off suggested retail.

Of course, the most UNIQUE value for both men and women is still the UNIQUE 100% cotton tanks and "T"s at $5 and $6 respectively in a rainbow of fashion colours. You really have to see and wear them to appreciate just how UNIQUE this fashion value really is.

Sidewalk sale event

On Saturday May 21 and Sunday May 22, Unique will hold its annual SIDEWALK SALE EVENT, with free soft drinks and snacks and, oh yes, prices up to 80% off suggested retail. It's an opportunity to " 'Picnic' with the whole family and 'Feast' on some UNIQUE values", says Rea. (With lines like that you could give up your day job, Derek – but you probably shouldn't).

Not satisfied with offering unique prices, Rea keeps the store looking unique; on each visit, in fact, the decor is a little bit different. Rea has an artist update it "almost daily" to reflect current trends. With the latest music playing in the background, "it's easier to dress up-to-the-minute when you feel up-to-the-minute," he says.

Add a UNIQUE selection of merchandise at guaranteed lowest prices, and it's easy to see why UNIQUE is UNIQUE in the denim and casual wear class.

The buck really does stop at Buckstop/Shop-rite stores

Success in business is easy, says Sidney Lugassy, co-owner (with his partner Jonathan Baena) of the new Buckstop/Shop-rite superstore in Lawrence Plaza. Just stock a store with the everyday items people use most – food, clothing, housewares, personal care products, etc. – and then price them so low that "my hand starts to shake when I write the price", says Lugassy. "If my hand doesn't shake and my palms don't sweat, then I know the price is too high."

A typical day sees Lugassy haggling with as many as thirty suppliers over deals. "It isn't pretty," he says, "but the prices sure look beautiful to our customers."

Some of the deals at Buckstop are, indeed, mind-boggling. Many items at $1 or $2 compare favourably with those sold elsewhere for three to five times as much. Hardware, luggage, school supplies, party supplies, food items – everything is marked down to the lowest possible price. This is one store where the term "low prices" really means something.

Seniors days

Those low prices get even lower for seniors on Tuesdays, when they are entitled to 10% off on everything except food, sale & promotional items.

Buckstop/Shop-rite is part of a growing chain that will soon open a store in Thornhill.

Monthly draws for some substantial prizes are now under way and will continue to June 30 (details below).

Ready for camp

Buckstop is well-stocked for the camp season, with a full range of merchandise that Lugassy guarantees to be as low or lower than anywhere else.

If it's kosher food you're after, Buckstop will save you huge sums on staples, as many shoppers discovered during Passover when Buckstop's prices on oil, matzoh and other items clearly undercut those of their competitors.

One trip to Buckstop will give you a good idea of the range of items sold, but the stock is constantly being updated with each new deal purchased by Lugassy. Since some of this merchandise sells out within a few days of hitting the shelves, the only way to cash in on every deal is to visit the store regularly. Many do, and Lugassy isn't complaining.

"At most stores, you may drop in to see what's on sale," he says. "At Buckstop, you drop in to see what's at regular price, because our regular prices are always rock-bottom."

And, though the store is large, Lugassy and his staff believe in serving you personally, and helping you find what you need. If they don't have it, "tell us and we'll get it," he says, "at the lowest possible price."

Photos a testament to Holocaust survivors

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Writer Elie Wiesel was moved when he saw the people in the photographs.

The 65 black-and-white pictures were portraits of Holocaust survivors from around the world, taken by 23-year-old Toronto documentary photographer Jason Schwartz.

Schwartz showed the photo collection, called Testament, to Wiesel in the author's New York apartment last March 23. They met through American photographer Arnold Newman.

Wiesel put his hand gently on Schwartz's shoulder. "A most worthwhile mission," he said.

Schwartz graduated from York University with a degree in fine arts in 1992. Since then he has been busy conducting group and individual photographic shows around Toronto. He also paints because he says it enhances his creative vision.

Testament began more than two years ago as a picture of his great-uncle, Henry Eisenman, a survivor of Auschwitz-Birkenau and other camps. The print struck such a deep chord within him that Schwartz went off to Israel and Europe to photograph other survivors.

"The product must trigger an emotional response in the audience. Without that spark the picture is lifeless," he said.

Overseas, Schwartz worked through local contacts he established in each country to locate survivors and ask them to become part of his expanding photo essay.

He also wanted their words to accompany their images. But Schwartz said it was difficult to get survivors to articulate the effects of the Holocaust on their lives. Few could readily encapsulate their memories of those years into a few sentences.

Among the survivors he met was Nikolaus Lehner, a former Dachau inmate who now lives five minutes from the camp's main gates. Lehner told Schwartz that after liberation he had nowhere else to go and decided to pick up the pieces of his shattered life in Dachau. His contribution to Testament was: "Indifference is the most tragic attribute to human suffering."

Schwartz undertook Testament to learn more about the Holocaust. "Most of what I knew of the Holocaust came from what I had heard from others, and sounded cliched. What the media gave us trivialized the enormity of the crimes committed against Jews. It made the events seem too remote, too unreal." He now feels he has been changed spiritually and intellectually.

For the past 24 months, Schwartz has catalogued, captioned and dedicated the photographs. He plans to publish the essay in book form later this year, then return to Israel to document the faces and fears of Israeli border soldiers.

Beat poet's ardor undimmed by time

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

It seems incredible that Allen Ginsberg, the poet laureate of the Beat Generation and the guru of American counterculture, is nearing the age of 70.

Time has certainly aged Ginsberg, but it has not dimmed his ardor as a literary, social and political icon.

This is the picture that Jerry Aronson draws in his intellectually stimulating documentary, The Life and Times of Allen Ginsberg, which is scheduled to open on May 13 at the Metropolitan Cinema.

The film is an amalgam of file footage, stills and interviews with personalities who've been touched by Ginsberg, people like Norman Mailer, Joan Baez, Abbie Hoffman and Timothy Leary, all of whom obviously respect him.

Aronson has done well by his subject. The Life and Times of Allen Ginsberg is an admiring and admirable profile of a luminous, though controversial, poet.

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Mystic Quest by David S. Ariel, Jason Aronson

Mysticism is religion at its most intense. It attempts to establish personal and intimate communion between the worshipper and God. The mystic cries out "Show me your glory." Often this quest for insight and meaning is accompanied by fasting, contemplation, special prayers, the study of occult knowledge and secret doctrines, songs and dances, and ecstatic exultation.

To those in the Jewish tradition who looked to rationalism and reasonableness as the best means of understanding God, the way of the mystic seemed childish and even superstitious.

Mystery of creation

The word Kabbalah means "doctrine received by tradition" and connotes the mystical aspect of Judaism. It goes back to pre-Common Era speculation about such obscure biblical teachings and traditions as the meaning of the seven branched menorah, the divination stones on the breastplate of the high priest, the prophetic visions of Ezekiel, the nature of angels, the various names for God, the taking up of Elijah to heaven, etc.

An early notable work in the field of Kabbalah was the Sefer Yetzira, the Book of Creation. It concerned itself with the mystery of the creation of the world and a symbolic system of numbers and letters. It introduced for the first time the doctrine of sephiroth, the 10 heavenly spheres, which became a basic enduring concept of Kabbalah.

Sometime in the 13th century, Spanish mystic Moses de Leon compiled the major work of Kabbalah, the Zohar. This is a mystical commentary in Aramaic, on the Five Books of Moses as well as an encyclopedia of occult lore. It contains treatises on astronomy, angels and demons, the mystic science of numbers, the seven palaces of heaven, a journey through Paradise, the 613 Commandments of the Torah, and adds an analysis of the Shema prayer. Further, it gives numerical values to the Hebrew letters in various Scriptural words.

Through the ages, Kabbalah spread from country to country and took many forms. Some medieval scholars tried to reconcile its teachings with the philosophical and scientific concepts of the age. In some places it became entirely practical, seeking to change the nature of events in a magical fashion, devoid of emotional and poetic content.

Chassidic influence

In the 16th century, in Safed, Palestine, Isaac Luria, known as the Ari, or the Lion, gathered a group of mystics together under his leadership and inspiration. His teachings included reincarnation and zimzum, the notion that God found it necessary in the act of creation to so contract Himself so an empty space was left through which it was possible for the world to unfold.

Chassidim, which appeared at the beginning of the 18th century in Poland, adopted many mystical practices in its protest against the rigid formalism of the prevailing Judaism.

The Mystic Quest provides a lucid explanation of the major ideas and concepts of Jewish mystical thought for the general reader. Among concepts discussed are theories about the hidden and revealed God, the feminine aspects of divinity, concepts of soul and human destiny, the Chassidic influence and the role of mysticism in contemporary Judaism.

The author, an authority on the subject, is president of the Cleveland College of Jewish studies. This work is a welcome addition to a growing library on a subject of many-sided fascination.

Avron's dream comes true with staging of Romanian play

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When he was a boy of nine in 1937, Chaim Avron, one of Toronto's theatre notables, saw Romania's most famous theatrical couple, Lenny Caler and George Vraca, in the romantic comedy A Winter Night's Dream.

"I dreamed of the time that I would be able to produce that play myself," he told The CJN.

That dream has come true. Avron's English-language staging of the play by leading Romanian playwright Tudor Musatescu is at Fairview Theatre Library May 24 to 29.

To make the occasion complete, Valerie Eugen Pop, Romania's ambassador to Canada, will come from Ottawa to attend the opening May 24 along with Vasile Jirjca, the consul general in Toronto.

Avron inherited his love of theatre from his grandmother, Esther Vineberg, who used to pick him up from the Bucharest theatre where he was a young choir member in Carmen.

Avron thinks it's a good omen that Hillary Goldhar of Toronto is playing the female lead in A Winter Night's Dream because she was the 17th performer he auditioned for the role and the Hebrew word for 17 is Tov, or good. Morris Jacobs of Toronto is the male lead in the play which takes place on a New Year's eve. It is the North American premiere for this comedy which has been staged all over Europe in many languages.

"I have done five rewrites of the play in making its adaptation into English," Avron said.

A Winter Night's Dream brings back happy memories of Bucharest to Avron who said it is set in a time when Jews lived peacefully in Romania. "It is a story of day-to-day events in the lives of ordinary people and should appeal to everybody," he said.

Theatre launches fund

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Theatre has established a new fund in memory of Earl Klein, an Edmonton Jewish actor who died suddenly April 5, one week before the WJT's April 16 opening performance of The Diary of Anne Frank in which Klein was cast as Otto Frank, Anne's father.

Klein, who was only 38 and in seemingly good health, was stricken by an aneurism. He died in Winnipeg.

According to Kayla Gordon, the WJTs artistic director, he fell ill Monday evening and was rushed to hospital. He slipped into a coma during the night and passed away the next day with his family at his side.

A graduate of Studio 58 Theatre School in Vancouver, Klein had been an actor, director, writer and teacher in western Canada for nearly two decades. Until last summer, he had served as artistic director of Edmonton's Nexus Theatre. Last year, he appeared in the WJT presentation of Crossing Delancey as Sam the Pickle Man.

"His death was a tragedy for all of us," Gordon said. "Working with him, we all came to love him. We have had calls from across Canada."

Vancouver actor Ron Halder, who played the role in a Vancouver production in February, will play Otto Frank.

Domb Records Bach Cello Suites: Adjunct-professor at the University of Toronto and principal cellist of the Toronto Symphony since 1974, cellist Daniel Domb has become the first Canadian to record Bach's six cello suites, an accomplishment that puts him in the company of a select few musicians.

Even as a child in Israel, Domb distinguished himself musically. At the age of 11, just three months after starting to study cello under renowned musician Paul Tortelier, Domb made his solo debut with the Haifa Symphony.

Tortelier was so impressed with Domb that he insisted the boy move to Paris and stay at his house to continue his cello studies. After a few years in Paris, the family came to New York, and received a surprise phone call from Leonard Bernstein inviting Domb to perform on television with the New York Philharmonic. He has since given recitals at Carnegie Hall, New York Town Hall, Wigmore Hall and the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam.

"The cello is the instrument closest to the human voice," Domb says, "and thus the most expressive. I feel that through the cello I can communicate the most intense emotions and feelings of music and of the human spirit."

Domb's recordings of Bach's six cello suites are on two CDs released on the Fanfare Mastersound label.

Yiddish at Metro Hall: Allan Merovitz, lead vocalist of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and a gifted actor, playwright and storyteller, performs Hartzedike-Lider ("Heartsongs") in the Rotunda of Metro Hall, 55 John St., Toronto, May 17 from 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. You don't have to be Jewish to enjoy Merovitz's melange of well-loved Yiddish songs with original stories of Jewish Canadians, but it helps. He appears as part of Mayworks 1994, the ninth annual Festival of Working People and the Arts.

Also presented as part of Mayworks 1994 is Common Enemies, Common Struggles, a set of photographs by Toronto photographer Hamid Sodeifi, also known as Left Eye. The theme is Sodeifi's experiences with racism and unemployment since arriving as a refugee from the Middle East seven years ago. CAW Local 40 Hall, 527 College St., May 12 to 20. BANKERS SENT TO PRISON

Former chairman of Bank Discount, Raphael Recanati (right) and his son Udi, leave the Jerusalem District Court after Recanati received an eight month prison sentence and a large fine. Udi also received a large fine. Senior bank officials were given sentences and fines for their part in the manipulation of bank shares 10 years ago. Several major Israeli banks has manipulated their shares and persuaded customers to invest large amounts of money knowing that the price of the shares was being manipulated.

Shoplifting numbers stabilize

TORONTO — The 1994 Shrinkage Survey of Canadian Retailers released at the Retail Council of Canada's Annual Loss Prevention Conference last month showed thieves are taking $2.25 billion in merchandise each year from Canadian stores.

This is the same level as reported last year, and marks the end of an upward trend over the past decade.

"Even though losses due to shoptheft are still at an intolerable level, Canadian retailers have managed to halt the upward trend," said Retail Council of Canada vice-president Mel Fruitman.

Fruitman said better trained staff, the use of anti-theft equipment, and an increase in prosecutions have helped stop crime.

"[But] $2.25 billion in losses is absolutely intolerable. If that money were available to retailers they. . .[could] become more competitive internationally and could create 100,000 new jobs."

The shrinkage rates, which include bookkeeping errors, customer theft and employee theft, ranged from a high of 2.1 per cent of sales in department and general merchandise stores, to a low of 0.5 per cent in furniture stores. Large organizations with shrinkage levels of 1.7 per cent suffer more than do the smallest stores at 1.0 per cent.

Retailers estimate that 80 per cent of total shrinkage is due to shoptheft — stealing by customers and employees. In addition to the loses, retailers spend significant amounts to bring the losses under control. Over 10 per cent of the companies surveyed reported spending 15 per cent of sales in their efforts to combat this crime.

"Retailers are vendors of merchandise — they are not police," said Fruitman.

The Retail Council of Canada has produced the Shrinkage Survey annually for the past four years. To order a copy contact the Publications Department at (416) 598-4684.

Multiplying Missions

ISRAEL — Israel will soon be opening its eighth Economic Mission office in North America. The site is Santa Clara, in the heart of California's Silicon Valley, where companies are showing considerable interest in Israel.

That's also where the BIRD Foundation, which specializes in U.S.-Israel industrial research and development, will set up its headquarters.

Israel operates Economic Missions in New York, Boston, Chicago, Atlanta, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Toronto. Ben Noy is the Canadian consul for economic affairs in the Toronto office.

The missions provide data and advice about investing in Israel, through private consultation, seminars and dozens of publications.

Funds Sees Booming Baby Business

CANADA — Evergreen-Canada Israeli Investments is expecting growth in the baby market.

It has signed an agreement to buy a 28 per cent stake for $2.1 million in the Shilav chain, which manufactures and sells children's clothes, toys, furniture cosmetics and other products.

The company is hardly in its infancy. There are 25 Shilav stores so far, with two more on the way.

Sales last year, at approximately $16.8 million (US) were up 30 per cent from the year before.

Hot Soup . . . Hot Profits

CANADA — A corporation familiar to Canadian Jewish food consumers is showing a healthy bottom line.

Osem Investments Ltd., the holding company for Osem food products, finished 1993 about $2.3 million ahead of the previous year. Net profit for 1993 was $15 million on sales of close to $230 million.

Osem is well known in North America for its soups and soup related products, but the company is also popular among Israel's Arab population.

During the holy month of Ramadan, when Muslims fast during the day and eat a festive meal at night, Osem aggressively marketed foods associated with the holiday period. It also distributed a Ramadan calendar with the times at which the fast started and finished each day.

Israeli Planners on Track

ISRAEL — Many Israelis and visitors to the country often wonder why train travel is so underdeveloped. Most commuters rely on cars and buses along the Tel Aviv to Jerusalem route, even though there are scheduled trains between the two cities.

A group of Israeli planners wants to bring rail travel back on track. They're recommending construction of nine new train stations in the centre of the country, close to trade and industrial areas.

Israel's Land Authority is already doing its best to make business travel more convenient by adding local airfields and expanding Ben Gurion airport.

The business behind viewing entertainment

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Behind the glitz of a movie or television production are the people who really deliver the latest in entertainment to viewers.

Today, many productions have operating budgets that can reach as high as $35 million; this means the business side of this glamorous world is extremely competitive and complicated.

Michael Taylor, vice-president of Telegenic Programs Inc., a television program distribution company in Toronto, calls his profession a "relationship business." Contacts are crucial.

Taylor, who has been with the 20-year-old firm for the past 10 years, announced that Telegenic Programs will be producing over $40 million in Canadian content television productions this year.

First is the $5 million two-hour CTV/ABC movie entitled Johnny's Girl starring Mia Kirshner, Treat Williams, Ron White, Frank Cassini and Shirley Douglas. The principal photography has been completed in and around Vancouver and is now in post production. The movie should air during the 94/95 season.

Also, in April, the company went into production on Lonesome Dove: The Series. With a budget of $35 million, it is one of the biggest budget series in Canada, Taylor says.

Why did the firm decide on this series?

Taylor says that the mini-series was an appealing, intriguing production that was widely viewed across the country. Canadian ratings show that CTV had 2.8 million viewers for the final instalment of the show and more than 2.6 million viewers as a four-night average.

In addition to these staggering statistics, Taylor says recognition of the series is a commodity. He explains that many of the viewing public are familiar with the name and the characters so when they see the series listed in the fall, they are likely to watch the show.

Not a random gamble. With the amount of money that is to be invested in the project, Taylor says it helps that broadcasters are also "comfortable" with the production. The mini-series' previous success translates into a low risk factor and a greater confidence in the production. Hopefully, this effect will trickle down from the broadcasters to the advertisers.

In the past, the thought of sinking a large amount of money into a series that carries the "Canadian content" label was considered foolish.

Taylor notes that this change in public perception is only one of the alterations to hit the television industry in the last decade.

He explains that increased competition and hi-tech equipment has made it almost impossible for viewers to distinguish between a made-in-America film and a Canadian production.

Another major change is "the consolidation of ownership of TV stations." Ten years ago, the estimated 100 television stations in Canada reorganized themselves from self-contained units into mini-buying groups.

For example, CanWest now has Global stations in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatchewan, and most recently, the Maritimes. The firm also has stations in Chile, New Zealand, and Australia. They have applied to the CRTC to receive stations in Calgary and Edmonton.

Taylor says the advantage is to the broadcasters, because now the parent company can buy specific productions for specific areas.

Specialty channels are another change, Taylor says, adding that his firm has applied to the CRTC for such a channel itself. This type of programming has taken responsibility away from local broadcasters.

Previously, local broadcasters had to try to fit all the popular programs in and amongst the viewers' calls for shows on rowing competitions. Now, those sports enthusiasts simply turn to one of the sports channels to watch their favorite athletes. This also holds true for music fans, religious shows and a host of many others.

Telegenic Programs is a privately owned television program distribution company formed 20 years ago by H. Lawrence Fein. With a combination of Fein's more than 35 years of television program distribution kowledge and the experience of the existing sales, servicing and support staff, Telegenic has developed into a major force in the industry. In Canada, the firm represents a variety of high profile U.S. network series, specials, TV movies and mini-series.

Dispute freezes loan guarantees

By DVORAH GETZLER
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — A dispute between the Finance Ministry and the Bank of Israel has frozen the money earmarked for immigrant absorption the United States helped secure by providing billions of dollars in loan guarantees.

The disagreement may have already cost Israel millions of dollars.

State Comptroller Miriam Ben-Porat is reported to have swooped down on the Treasury and taken away bundles of documents to help in her office's probe of the dispute.

The Treasury apparently wanted to use the money secured with the loan guarantees to help companies wishing to invest in new infrastructure projects or to expand their investments in existing projects of that type.

But the Bank of Israel objected to the Treasury's direct involvement in determining who should receive the money.

As a result, a considerable part of the money has been left on deposit abroad for a period far longer than initially anticipated.

The much sought-after loan guarantees were offered to Israel by the Bush administration after a protracted and bitter fight with the American Jewish community.

They were secured at a relatively high rate of interest — in the region of seven per cent annually — while the interest being paid on the current deposits abroad is at a lower short-term rate of only some 3.5 to four per cent.

Bank of Israel figures issued last week indicate that of the $3 billion Israel raised on the U.S. money market, only some $800 million has so far been disbursed, leaving $2.2 billion unused.

The Treasury claims the U.S.-guaranteed loans are being spent daily as the general Israeli public and the business sector buy foreign currency to finance investment and the import of capital goods needed to push economic growth at an accelerated pace.

According to a report in the Hebrew daily newspaper Ha'aretz, the Treasury explained the drain on foreign currency reserves is being financed by loans the U.S. funds are guaranteeing.

As a result, said the Treasury, Israel is getting credit on the best possible terms available in the world's money markets.

Entrepreneur contest

TORONTO — The search is on for Canada's top entrepreneurs.

Ernst & Young — along with Canadian Business magazine, Bank of Montreal and Burns Fry Limited — announced recently it will sponsor the Entrepreneur Of The Year Awards, an extensive search to find the nation's most talented and successful entrepreneurs.

Ron Gage, chair and chief executive officer of Ernst & Young in Canada, says the program has given the firm another way to support and promote the entrepreneurial spirit in Canada.

"There are a great many entrepreneurial success stories out there," Gage says. "Canadian entrepreneurs have made great sacrifices — in some cases, against great odds — to realize their dreams. We think those stories should be told as often as possible. We also believe that these visionaries and risk takers should be recognized for their contributions to the economic growth of our country."

Ernst & Young, Canadian Business magazine, Bank of Montreal and Burns Fry Limited will organize searches for the best entrepreneurs in five regions across Canada — Pacific Canada (British Columbia), Western Canada (Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba), Ontario, Quebec, and Atlantic Canada. Nominations close June 15, 1994. Regional award recipients will be announced at regional banquets in late September and early October.

The Entrepreneur Of The Year Awards recognize excellence in many different sectors, including agriculture and food, construction, life science, retail, natural resources, services, manufacturing, wholesale/distribution, high technology, real estate and financial services, among others. Final categories will be determined by the nature of the nominations received — and by the panels of independent judges.

Tips From Pros

By LEON BOOKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Whatever happened to good old-fashioned customer courtesy, a simple hello, a smile? Whatever happened to employees who look and act as if they are interested in what they are doing, as if they care? Whatever happened to good customer relations, customer satisfaction?

If retail executives expect their salespeople to become knowledgeable, productive, employees, all must be made aware that the most important person in a business is the customer — that the success of the business, and yes, the employees' future, depends almost entirely on satisfying the customer.

Here are some suggestions that will ensure customer-centred service. It is largely being mindful of the customer in performing every task.

Treat the customer as someone special. No matter how much or how little customers spend in a particular business, they have a right to be treated as someone special.

Greet customers warmly. A friendly greeting, at the very least a cordial "good morning," or a smile and a nod, tells customers you are glad to see them.

Learn and use customers' names; their names are music to their ears. It is a wonderful feeling to be recognized in this manner and a mood of goodwill is immediately established. Follow up with a brief complimentary remark which is sincere. This is not flattery, rather it is recognition.

Acknowledge the customer's presence. The practical application here is obvious for anyone working in direct contact with customers. If you're busy with a customer when another arrives, acknowledge their presence. A simple statement like "I'll be with you in a minute," will keep the newly arrived customer from getting impatient while waiting to be served.

Be a good listener. It is very frustrating to be made to feel you are being ignored because the salesperson wasn't listening. It is very important to find out what the customer wants. Your attention and assistance builds loyalty and makes the customer feel that you are glad to help.

Friendliness is contagious. If you are friendly and polite to customers, they will naturally be more friendly to you. If, on the other hand, you are glum, abrupt or discourteous you will probably receive the same treatment — and lose a sale besides.

Handling customer complaints: As a rule most of the people who patronize a business are pleasant and easy to deal with. However, you are bound to encounter an occasional customer who has a complaint, who is irritated — often angry. It takes a great deal of tact and diplomacy to handle the situation properly and at the same time maintain the good will of the customer.

Take pride in doing the little things right. Often it's the little things that determine whether a customer's shopping trip is a pleasure or a chore. Doing the little things right means going out of your way to do a bit more than the customer expects of you.

Be informed about the merchandise you sell. Customers have every right to expect salespeople to be informed about the merchandise they are selling, to be familiar with the policies and procedures related to their job.

Be honest. If you are asked for your opinion about something the customer is interested in, give an honest opinion. Do not let the desire to make a sale be your prime objective.

These are but a few suggestions on how to make customer-centred service effective. Every contact between an employee and a customer is important. Favorable contacts can possibly do more to bring customers back to your establishment than advertising campaigns, promotions and low prices. Yes company advertising and good value bring customers in the first place, but it is the kind of service described above that keeps them coming back.

CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's the bottom of the ninth, men on first and third, two out and you step to the plate. Glavine winds up; there's the pitch, a swing and a miss. Strike one.

You eject a brown stream of tobacco juice and dig into the dirt at homeplate. Here comes the second pitch, a breaking ball that forgets to break. You swing — KNUCK. It's going, going, it's outta here. Home run!

You win the World Series! You win the World Series!

In your dreams, right?

You bet. But so what? Nowadays, childhood dreams can come true even if, technically, you're an adult and any chance you had of playing pro ball disappeared along with that thick head of hair.

Enter the Adult Sports Fantasy Camps, run by proprietor Sheldon Kideckel. The company president is offering would-be Paul Molitors "the thrill of a lifetime, to don a major league uniform at spring training" and take to the field against a smattering of former Blue Jays.

"It's an opportunity [for participants] to test their mettle and skills against major leaguers," Kideckel said.

The camp, scheduled for June 5-10 at the Deerhurst Resort, will feature instruction from the likes of Ernie Whitt, Rance Mullinliks, Lloyd "the Shaker" Moseby, John Cerutti and Alvis Woods, a Blue Jay original who tagged the team's first-ever pinch-hit homerun on opening day in 1977.

Each participant will receive a uniform bearing his name and will be lodged two to a room at the resort. They will take part in tryouts, calisthenics and baseball drills in batting, fielding and throwing. (No word yet whether tobacco-chewing and sunflower seed-spitting are on the agenda.)

The intention is to let participants feel what it's like to be at a major league spring training camp, Kideckel said.

The 100 participants will be divided into eight teams (managed by the pros) and each afternoon they'll either play a tournament game or work to improve their skills. The tournament will culminate in a "World Series" game followed by what could well be the highlight of the week — an all-star game featuring the weekend warriors versus the major league veterans.

At stake are bragging rights and a lifetime of memories.

Camp participants will also receive 10 authentic-looking trading cards that one day might fool your grandchildren into believing you really played major league ball.

While baseball fantasy camps are fairly common in the United States, this is the first of its kind in Canada to employ former major leaguers, Kideckel said.

What makes this fantasy camp so attractive, he added, is the five-star Deerhurst Resort with amenities like golf, boating, windsurfing, waterskiing, tennis and horseback riding. Kosher meals are available on request.

Cost of the extravaganza is $2,499, and for $500 more you can bring along a wife, child, friend or maybe a scout.

TORONTO — With Canadian banks raising mortgage rates, the natural reaction of most people is to panic and lock into longer terms.

While many leading economists say this increase is merely an aberration and are advising people to sit tight, many homeowners are moving to longer term mortgages, says Toronto financial consultant Sonny Goldstein.

Goldstein, president of Creative Ideas in Financial Planning, believes it's in the best interest of the banks to panic people and motivate them to move to longer terms.

"The banks' largest source of capital is residential mortgages and they were suffering with narrower margins. Now they've scared people into longer terms so that people are locking in at 9½ per cent, while the banks are offering 5-year GICs at 6½ per cent. Banks are now back to their traditional three-point spread which they always try to maintain.

"With the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, and rising global rates, the Bank of Canada had no choice but to hike up the Canadian interest rate to stabilize the Canadian dollar. As far as I'm concerned, the banks' actions are manipulation of the worst kind. It's no secret that the wealth of our country and of the free world, for that matter, is controlled by the banks. Just look at the astronomical salaries of the banks' CEOs and the record profit they had in '93 during a low interest environment," he says.

Goldstein's advice is twofold: He believes that as Canadians, we're allowing the banks to control our economy and that we have a duty to protest and get politically involved in changing the system. Secondly, on a personal level, he advises investors to use common sense and to choose a financial planner willing and able to educate them on market changes and how their investments will be affected so they won't make rash decisions when the economy begins to turn.

Goldstein, who has been in the insurance and financial planning fields since 1986, also advises that retirement planning is not a do-it-yourself project. He says people need professional advice, someone they can trust to help them plan and save for those later years.

A migraine cure?

An Israeli company, Galilee Herbal Remedies, says it has discovered a cure for the pain caused by migraine headaches using an herb that, ironically, has been known for its medicinal properties for over 200 years. The herb is Panacetum parthenium, commercially known as feverfew.

The company, located on Kibbutz Kfar Hanassi, discovered that by utilizing the kibbutz's agricultural knowhow, relying on Israel's mild climate and calling upon a few trade secrets, they were able to create capsules with high levels of parthenolide, the essential ingredient in feverfew. This not only relieves migraine headache pain but also helps alleviate arthritis pain and pre-menstrual tension.

SUPPORT FOR AGUNOT

Marchers at a recent demonstration in Thornhill, Ont. carry placards in Hebrew and English in support of Yoni Shalev and other agunot. The Hebrew on the centre placard reads: 'To all women who are denied a get: there is hope. Good luck!!!' At left is a plea from Yoni Shalev: 'Uzi Shalev, I don't want anything from you! [Just] give me the get.' [Alron photo] (Story on page 6.)

Peace plan in play

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After a week of delays, implementation of Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip and Jericho has finally started to gather steam.

In Gaza last week, the newly formed Palestinian police force assumed control in the town of Rafah, which lies on the border with Egypt.

Accompanied by the cheers of thousands of Gaza residents, a force of Palestinian police took over the town of Deir el-Balah, making it the first area to fall officially under Palestinian control.

In Jericho, an advance group of Palestinian officers entered the city and began preparations for assuming control there.

Officials with the Israel Defence Force were meanwhile gearing up to escort a convoy of 300 Palestinian police who were soon to arrive from their staging point in Jordan.

The police were to travel through Israel to Gaza, where they would assume their duties. They were allowed to travel fully armed but they were not to be issued ammunition until their arrival in Gaza.

One Israeli officer expressed caution about the operation.

"In an orderly manner, under our supervision and responsibility, they will reach Gaza through the State of Israel," he said.

The officer said this was the first time a convoy of this sort had been planned, and, he added, "It may be the last."

Also last week, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat announced the names of 15 of the 24 people who will serve as members of the Palestinian Authority, the body that will oversee Palestinian affairs in Gaza and Jericho.

Among the 15 were Arafat himself; Ahmed Karia, also known as Abu Alaa, head of the PLO's economic division; Nabil Sha'ath, a senior adviser to Arafat who was also chief Palestinian negotiator at the Israeli-PLO talks successfully concluded last week in Cairo; Saeb Erekat, a member of the Palestinian negotiating team in Washington; Hanan Ashrawi, a former Palestinian spokeswoman; and Elias Freij, the mayor of Bethlehem.

Sha'ath said that the remaining names would be submitted to Israel within the next few days.

During a special meeting of the Israeli cabinet last Wednesday, it was announced that the Palestinian Authority will assume control of the entire Gaza Strip and Jericho district by the middle of this week.

Cabinet unanimously approved the Gaza-Jericho implementation agreement, with Deputy Chief of General Staff Maj.-Gen. Amnon Shahak telling ministers the IDF could complete its pullout from Gaza and Jericho by the end of this week.

"Amnon [Shahak] said the withdrawal could be complete by [this] Friday," one minister said later privately,

"By Friday ... authority for the southern part of the Gaza Strip and all of Jericho will be transferred to the Palestinians. By next Wednesday, authority will be transferred for all of the Gaza Strip," Environment Minister Yossi Sarid later told reporters.

Officials in the prime minister's office have not ruled out complete withdrawal by then, but one hastened to add, "There can always be delays."

Angered that Palestinian police did not arrive when they were expected, Jericho youths shouted at troops and threw stones. Troops responded with tear gas and stun grenades.

Report on sex concerns rabbis

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some Conservative rabbis in Canada are casting a wary eye at a provocative draft report on human sexuality, released earlier this month at the annual convention in the Catskills of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA).

Entitled "This is My Beloved, This is My Friend," the 35-page pastoral letter has yet to be approved by the movement's authoritative Committee on Jewish Law and Standards before becoming official policy. Even so, it may drive a bigger wedge between liberal rabbis in the Conservative movement and their more traditionalist counterparts, many of those in Canada.

Two years in the making, the groundbreaking report by the RA's Commission on Human Sexuality strongly advocates marriage and calls on Jews to have three or four children.

But it also accepts that even outside marriage, committed and loving relationships between single Jews "can embody a measure of holiness."

The report also delves into such controversial areas as AIDS, the halachic view on contraceptives, Jewish sexual values, teen sex, and infidelity, and addresses — some would argue tiptoes around — the delicated subject of homosexuality, which has rocked Conservative Judaism since 1990.

Included in the report is what is believed to be the first call on Conservative Jews to consider observing the laws of family purity. These include the prohibition of sex during a woman's menstrual period and for a week thereafter, followed by her immersing herself in a mikvah.

"Judaism has much to teach all of us about how we should think about sex and how we should behave sexually — whether a person is single or married, heterosexual or homosexual," the pastoral letter states.

The letter, drafted by Los Angeles Rabbi Elliot Dorff, strongly condemns adultery and incest as well as "casual or promiscuous sexual encounters, since they involve little or no love or commitment."

It stresses that Judaism "understands marriage to be the proper venue for sex in the first place."

But for singles, sex can mean that "all of the concepts and values described [for married couples] apply to their sexual activities ... Committed, loving relationships between mature people who strive to conduct their sexual lives according to the concepts and values described [in the letter] can embody a measure of holiness, even if it is not the full portion available in marriage."

Reportedly, one of the most hotly debated aspects of the letter was the possibility of holiness in non-marital relationships.

Another was the letter's stand on homosexuality. It acknowledges the issue "has become a deep source of controversy," but repeats a 1990 Conservative resolution that endorsed full civil (not religious) equality for gays and lesbians and said such Jews should be welcomed as members in Conservative congregations, yet stressed that traditional Judaism recommends a heterosexual lifestyle.

In 1992, the movement's law committee voted to accept a minority responsum that Conservative Jewry no longer view homosexuality as an abomination. But it also accepted a majority view reaffirming that homosexuality is Torah-abhorrent.

According to the movement's rules, both views are valid and can be used as bases for action by rabbis and synagogues.

The pastoral letter states homosexuality is "a result of both nature and nurture" and that a person's sexual orientation "is not a matter of choice."

In the view of many Canadian Conservative rabbis, their movement has been sliding to the left ever since it began ordaining women a decade ago. Stands on homosexuality and other matters have pushed some rabbis, especially in Ontario, perilously close to breaking away from the RA.

In 1992, Rabbi Wayne Allen of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue resigned as chair of the RA's Ontario wing and quit the RA altogether, partly over the creation of the commission on human sexuality and the movement's stance on homosexuality.

'All sorts of lights are flashing'

Among other Conservative rabbis in Ontario, unhappiness with the movement's direction has been simmering ever since.

Rabbi Eliot Malomet of Montreal, who attended the RA's convention, said he's "quite convinced" the commission's draft "will be torn apart piece by piece, limb from limb" by the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards to make it conform to Halachah.

However, Rabbi Malomet said he's "concerned" about the report's stance on non-marital sex.

"All sorts of lights are flashing," he told The CJN. "Kiddushin [sanctifying a marriage] also means boundaries, and those must stay intact. Either something is kosher or it isn't."

He said he joins with other Conservative leaders who believe the real issue facing the movement is not sex but continuity.

As for splitting the Conservative rabbinate between left and right, Rabbi Malomet said "the wedge is already there."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation agrees that while much of the report speaks of a "positive and healthy framework within kedushah," the controversy revolves around its stands on non-marital sex and homosexuality.

"The report realistically reflects the situation of many Jews who are single. It clearly understands that teens and young adults are sexually active and it tries to create an ethical framework to provide guidance to young people.

JCC branches plan fundraising campaign

Tennis at JCC Valley branch

Valley's goal set at $1 million

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Speculation over the financial future of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has hurt the Valley branch, but the recent proposed bailout by the Federation and the pending independence of the branch should turn that situation around, said Allan Wexler, chair of the branch's management committee.

"Anything that creates some sense of security is beneficial for the Valley," he said. Rumors that the JCC faced bankruptcy had made it difficult in recent months to sell memberships. With an autonomous future ahead, that situation should turn around, he said.

Under terms of an arrangement between the JCC, the Federation and the Bank of Montreal, the Centre's main creditor, the Valley branch at Leslie and Steeles will become independent. A non-profit corporation run by a users' group will be established to acquire the property for $1 million and another members' corporation will run the facility. The $1 million, to be raised over five years, will comprise the Valley's contribution towards payment of the JCC's massive debt.

"We're very pleased that the arrangement was made," Wexler told The CJN. "Without some assistance [from the Federation] and a financial restructuring, the entire agency [the JCC] was at risk."

While acknowledging that the vast majority of the JCC's debt was run up at the JCC's other branches, Wexler said that like in any enterprise, some segments of "the business contribute to the betterment of the others.

"The plan is fair in that it works out to the benefit of the overall agency," he said. In the past, he noted, the JCC aided the Valley branch to get through difficult times.

Wexler said he is confident that many of the Valley's 850 members will help in the upcoming fundraising campaign.

He said the Valley's pastoral location away fom the hustle and bustle of the city make it an attractive facility for members and their families. "There is a special atmosphere there, an informality. It's not a country club setting, it's more of a camp setting," he said.

In addition to its adult members, 400-500 children use the facility on a limited basis. The branch also operates a nursery school and provides day-care as well.

"The long-range plans are for the [Valley] to be more of a community centre," offering educational, social and cultural programming in addition to its core tennis and swimming programs, Wexler said.

With the tripartite agreement set, the branch has begun to consider a variety of fundraising schemes. "It looks like the core members are committed to it," he said. "There is a very strong core membership who would do as much as they could because they see [the Valley] as the place to be."

Despite his optimism, Wexler is expecting some members to leave if the Valley hikes its tennis/swim fees by as much as $500 per member to help in the fundraising campaign. That jump in fees for the 1995 season is being considered by the branch committees studying the Valley's future, he said.

Currently, members pay $545 for single tennis/swim membership and $1,025 for a family membership.

Wexler foresees the Valley's being run more efficiently under the new arrangement, with management having a better appreciation of the special needs and strengths of the facility. "That could lead it to being more efficiently run with more specific marketing," he suggested.

Bloor to rely on member support

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT) was asked by the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) last summer to help it meet its financial obligations, a task force at the Centre's Bloor Street branch took a step back from its deliberations and adopted a wait and see attitude.

For more than six months, the task force had been meeting to investigate ways it could "secure" the downtown facility in the face of long-standing rumors that the branch might be sold to pay off a portion of the JCC's debts.

As the task force bided its time, the JCC, the JFGT and the Bank of Montreal, the JCC's main creditor, hammered out an agreement that will see the Federation bail out the JCC.

The task force was more than pleased with the agreement, even though it calls for a $3 million contribution towards payment of the JCC's debtload.

A corporate entity that will be established by the downtown membership group as part of a massive restructuring of the JCC will be responsible for raising the amount, in exchange for which it will get control over the Bloor Street property.

The Federation will make available $750,000 over three years for the purchase of debentures to assist the users in acquiring the property.

The facility will no longer be a "branch" or an asset of the JCC but a full-fledged independent entity owned by a company responsible to the local members.

That will substantially meet the requirements set out long ago by the Bloor task force, said Karen Chisvin, chair of the Bloor management committee.

"What is now going to happen is exactly what Bloor wanted to happen," said Mark Sarner, chair of the task force. "The concept of creating a new Bloor that ran and owned and financed itself with a mission to serve the downtown Jewish community originated at Bloor.

"As a result of the Federation deal, we are getting the opportunity to do exactly what we set out to do. . . with the added benefit of a significant level of Federation support," he said.

In addition to financial assistance, the Federation has offered its expertise in fundraising to help the membership group raise the $3 million, Bloor's share of the JCC's $9.5 million bank debt.

Both Sarner and Chisvin were confident that such a campaign will prove to be a success.

"This is built on the premise that there is a community that wants and supports a downtown community centre," Sarner said. "We believe there are people who want to keep it alive and will contribute to that end."

While a goal of $3 million, along with a further $1 million to renovate and upgrade the facility, might appear daunting, Sarner said he expects the downtown community to rally around the centre. "More and more people are asking how they can help and they're saying, when you need me, I'll be there."

If the nay-sayers prove to be right and the $4 million is too ambitious a goal, "that would be sad for the downtown Jewish community," he said. The question of whether the facility is viable as an independent entity will be answered by the fundraising process, he added.

"The premise for what we're doing is that Bloor is alive, it's vital and pivotal to the vitality and growth of what is a very sizeable Jewish community in the downtown area. Everything hinges on that."

The Bloor branch has approximately 3,500 facility users.

Stuart Schoenfeld, professor of sociology at York University, pointed out that the Jewish population downtown has continued to grow over the past 10 years. That remains true whether downtown is measured south from Bloor, St. Clair or Eglinton.

"For many people downtown, this is their primary institutional link to the Jewish community," Sarner said. "It's the last remaining Jewish institution on Spadina, so it's a link to the past."

The new Bloor JCC will offer a full athletic membership program in upgraded facilities, he said. While it is not yet clear whether memberships will be accepted at all current JCC branches, Sarner said "I think we'll probably see our membership strengthen and probably we'll attract a lot of new users who have not renewed [in the past] due to concerns over the security of the property."

Labor Party rebel gets nod to head Histadrut federation

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In an unprecedented defeat for the traditional Labor Party establishment, upstart Haim Ramon has succeeded in his quest to head Israel's massive Histadrut labor federation.

With 84 per cent of the ballots counted the morning after last Tuesday's nationwide election, Ramon had received 47 per cent of the votes for his New Life in the Histadrut party, against 33 per cent for Labor, headed by incumbent Histadrut Secretary-General Haim Haberfeld.

Ramon, a former Israeli health minister, broke away from Labor last month to enter the Histadrut race.

Likud, always a minor force in the Labor-dominated Histadrut, received only 18 per cent, a decline from its previous strength that reflected Ramon's inroads among Likud voters.

Joining Ramon and other breakaway Labor members in the New Life for the Histadrut slate were the left-wing Meretz bloc and Orthodox Sephardi Shas party.

Haim Ramon

Ramon campaigned on a platform of reform, although it remains to be seen how much he will be able to wrest control away from the deeply entrenched Histadrut bureaucracy.

But it is clear he scored a victory in what is being seen as the first fight in the next era of Israeli politics.

It is an era in which issues of economics are expected to eclipse those of war and peace, and in which the prime minister will be elected on a personal basis, rather than on party lines.

There has been speculation that Ramon, 46, may spearhead the creation of a new left-of-centre party.

Inside or out, Ramon has now become a leading contender to follow septuagenarians Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres when they bow out of the party leadership.

He has displaced a whole generation of middle-aged politicians who have been waiting in the wings, including such aspiring leaders as Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and Police Minister Moshe Shahal.

The only person with comparable political popularity to Ramon on the left of the party is Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak, the Israel Defence Force chief of staff.

Barak is seen as certain to join Labor when he sheds his uniform. His candidacy is being touted as one that will reassure an electorate fearful of Palestinian autonomy.

Ramon's victory last week is the culmination of a strategy going back to before Labor's 1992 primaries. At that time Ramon staked out as his area of concern the relationship between the Histadrut labor federation, the Histadrut-linked Kupat Holim Klalit health fund and the Labor Party.

Following Labor's June 1992 victory, Ramon was named minister of health. He resigned the post in February when Labor refused to back his proposed national health reform bill.

The bill would have severed the link between the Histadrut and its mammoth health fund, the Kupat Holim Klalit. The Histadrut pressured Labor to torpedo the bill, fearing a threat to its power.

Currently, according to Ramon and other Histadrut critics, many people join the union only because its dues are included in their health fund premiums.

Ramon now promises to do as Histadrut chief what he failed to achieve as health minister.

Before last week, the Labor Party — including Rabin — charged that Ramon was weakening the party just when it needed all its strength to push through the agreement on Palestinian autonomy.

After the results of the election were in, however, Rabin declared that "the Likud is the enemy," and urged a Labor-Ramon coalition in the Histadrut.

Labor fought its ultimately losing battle against Ramon bitterly. As the campaign entered its final days, the election proved as dirty as any for national or local office.

Most infamously, Shas heatedly protested as anti-Semitic and pornographic a Labor Party poster attacking the Ramon-Meretz-Shas alliance.

It depicted Meretz leader Shulamit Aloni dancing in her underwear with Shas leader Aryeh Deri, under the heading "Dirty Dancing II."

But Deri said after the elections that the campaign and its results would not influence his party's promised, but delayed, return to the governing Labor coalition.

Soldiers close Jericho to media

Reporters who had been invited to Jericho for a Tuesday civil administration press briefing were kept away by soldiers who told them Jericho had been declared a closed military area to journalists. Several reporters abandoned their cars and walked to Jericho, but missed the briefing.

At the cabinet meeting, the IDF's coordinator of activities in the territories, Maj.-Gen. Danny Rothschild, predicted that Arafat will enjoy an upsurge of public support as Palestinians actually see negotiations become a reality.

Everything about the cabinet vote appeared to be anticlimactic.

The session was held a day after the Palestinian police had entered the Gaza Strip and took over Deir el-Balah.

The entire discussion of the 186-page document took no longer than 90 minutes.

The Knesset's rare unanimity (the vote was 52-0 to approve the agreement) occurred only after all the members of opposition parties walked out, demanding the government hold a national referendum on the accord.

In the debate leading up to the vote, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin spoke of the "great pleasure" it gave him to see Israeli soldiers give up their posts on the strife-ridden streets of Gaza, where they were replaced this week by the first contingents of Palestinian police.

Israeli soldiers, Rabin said, have "no business there, and no one has the right to endanger their lives by keeping them there. No one!"

Rabin assured the Knesset that the agreement contained no secret clauses.

"This is a good agreement that presents us with a real chance for peace," the prime minister said.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu countered with his own view of the situation, charging that Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres were the only people anywhere in the world who still trusted Arafat.

"You have been cheating the public," Netanyahu asserted, adding that "the day this agreement was signed was a black day for us. It is a catastrophe, a mistake of historic proportions."

As Netanyahu spoke of Arafat's "expansionist" goals, charging they would extend far beyond Israel's borders, Rabin shrugged dismissively and said, "Nonsense."

Jewish war vets, CJC to hold memorial

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish War Veterans of Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) will honor those who served Canada during World War II at a ceremony at the War Memorial in Ottawa on May 31.

The ceremony takes place a week before hundreds of people gather here to observe the 50th anniversary of D-Day, which marked the beginning of the end of World War II.

"It has a Jewish resonance because D-Day led the way to the liberation of the camps," says Alan Rose, executive vice-president of CJC and a war veteran himself.

Organizers expect about 150 Jewish war veterans from across the country to attend the ceremony. Wearing full uniform, they will assemble at the Sparks St. Mall and, led by a military pipe band, march the few blocks to the War Memorial near Parliament Hill.

There, they will be met by members of Parliament, state dignitaries and the ambassadors and military attaches from 23 countries that fought the Nazis during World War II. A Canadian Armed Forces central band and a guard of honor will also participate.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Machzikei Hadas Congregation will lead a brief service in memory of soldiers who died at war.

The ceremony is part of the year-long commemoration of the events that led to the end of the war.

Eric Vernon, director of legislative analysis for CJC, says organizers wanted to honor war veterans while they could.

"The fact is that the number of Jewish war veterans is dwindling every year, so this is going to be an opportunity to pay fitting tribute to them," he said.

Survivors span the miles to reunite after 50 years

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

North York resident Judith Rubinstein, a survivor of Auschwitz-Birkenau, recently returned from Genoa, Italy, where she met another survivor of the camp after 50 years.

At last fall's Jewish Book Fair, Rubinstein picked up an autobiography of Italian author Liana Millu, which described Millu's experiences in the notorious death camp. Rubinstein, a Hungarian Jew, and Millu were both 24 in 1944, the year they were deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau.

In Smoke Over Birkenau, Millu writes about the final months of the war in a German concentration camp at Malhow, the camp Rubinstein was sent to from Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Two of the hundreds of women in the camps, Rubinstein and Millu never got to know each other during the war.

When Rubinstein realized that Millu's experiences mirrored her own, she got Millu's address from the Italian consulate and the women began corresponding.

Rubinstein, determined to meet Millu face-to-face, made plans to visit Italy this summer.

However, when she received an unexpected invitation to an April bar mitzvah in Italy, she decided to make the trip sooner. She was accompanied by her son Robert Eli Rubinstein and his wife Renee.

To Rubinstein's dismay, two incidents disrupted her plans to spend some time with Millu. The flight to Milano was delayed by a day, and on top of that, Rubinstein accidentally grabbed the wrong suitcase at the Milano airport. By the time Rubinstein got her luggage back and was settled in a hotel in Genoa, it was too late for her to get to the meeting she had scheduled with Millu.

The following morning Rubinstein and Millu had only two hours together. "Such an emotional meeting, holding hands and crying all the time," recalled Rubinstein. "There was so much to talk about and time was very short." Millu, she added, was on her way to lecture university students in another city about the Holocaust.

Although Rubinstein found it difficult to talk to Millu because Millu's English is poor, Rubinstein predicted that the meeting would pave the way for their future correspondence."

In a letter Rubinstein received after she got back to Toronto, Millu said, "I am happy to have the opportunity to recognize you from Birkenau's fog, so full of humanity ... [this] is the best gift, one of the gifts of life."

The day after they met Millu, the Rubinsteins drove to the Torino area, in search of the site of the Displaced Persons' camp where Judith Rubinstein gave birth to her son. She and her husband Bill had spent nearly three years there after the war.

Rubinstein, in broken Italian, asked people on the street for directions, and by startling coincidence she ran into a former partisan, 61-year-old Nicola Catalano, who showed the Rubinsteins the former camp in the town of Grugliasco. Catalano later burst into tears when he saw the tattooed numbers from Auschwitz-Birkenau on Rubinstein's forearm.

A psychiatric hospital before the war, the buildings at the camp site were again being used as a hospital.

Rubinstein showed her son Robert the garden in which she married his father. "He was very, very emotional about it," she recalled.

The group went on a tour of the buildings, including the one that contained the room Rubinstein and her husband had shared along with six other couples. "I was so shaken up," she said. "The building just brought back the memories."

Rubinstein taught dressmaking at one of the camp's Organization for Rehabilitation through Training (ORT) workshops. She recalled she had trouble communicating with her students as they spoke different dialects of Yiddish. Most of them had never worked at a sewing machine, either. "It was quite an education working there, until I had to go to the hospital to have my baby."

Rubinstein's memories of Italy are bittersweet. The happiness of marriage and the joy of giving birth to her first child, she remembers, were marred by restlessness and anxiety about the future. "We felt like we were in a sanitorium, recovering from an illness, waiting to go somewhere."

The family had hoped to make aliyah, but after their three-year wait, they opted to move to Canada in September of 1948.

Rubinstein said many people she met on her trip worry about the resurgence of fascism in Italy and the direction the newly elected right-wing government is headed.

Among the concerned is Dr. Caterina Corbascio, the fortyish head of the hospital. An anti-fascist, Corbascio was unaware the hospital had been a Displaced Persons' camp. "She was very surprised," said Rubinstein. "She wanted to know everything about it."

With the aim of telling Rubinstein's story to other Italians, Corbascio contacted a reporter friend who asked Rubinstein if she would consent to be interviewed for La Republica, one of Italy's major newspapers.

Although she was initially hesitant, Rubinstein said she did the interview because Corbascio told her the story would help to counter fascism and that Italians needed to remember that the previous government, which had been in power since the war, had been good to people, even those who were not Italian.

In the newspaper story, Rubinstein says thank you to the Italian people for the kindness they showed to her and her family.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

MALINSKY, MARKOWITZ, DERSHOVITZ, ROVNER

Place names (toponymics) often disclose the origin of a family. Although Jews migrated from place to place for economic sustenance, the assumption of a place name as a surname probably indicates the progenitor took root in the village or shtetl.

Hence, it is fair to assume the bearers of the following names settled in Ukraine:

Malinsky from Malin near Kiev; Markowitz from Markovich near Lvov; Dershovitz from Deshov, sometimes called Derzow; and Rovno also near Lvov.

DONNENFELD — DANNENBERG

My friend, Eddie Donnenfeld, is curious about the origin of his surname. It is a variation of place names in Germany — Dannenberg and Dannenwalde, both west of Berlin. The greater probability is that it was built around the Hebrew name "Dan" with a fancy suffix like berg or feld.

Allegations against Inco found untrue

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — News reports which alleged that mining giant Inco Ltd. imported ex-Nazi stormtroopers in the 1950s to disrupt union activities were based on unreliable hearsay information, an RCMP officer contends.

The articles, which appeared in November 1993 editions of the Sudbury Star, cite 32-year-old RCMP intelligence reports, but the articles fail to mention that the RCMP investigator did not consider the information he reported reliable, said Constable Andre Deneault, an RCMP officer attached to the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

Deneault said the RCMP investigating officer at the time, Staff Sgt. A.R. Campbell, obtained his information from union insiders. But because the "union was run by communists" who were anti-management, Campbell considered the information tainted and unreliable, Deneault said. The Star articles failed to mention that, he added.

In the series of investigative articles that examined the postwar history of mining activities in Ontario's north, the Sudbury Star reported that ex-Nazi stormtroopers and Hungarian freedom fighters were hired by Inco. These workers disrupted union meetings and organizational campaigns by the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers.

Jim Tester, a former president of the union, confirmed elements of the Star story when contacted by The CJN in November 1993. He said many laborers in the mining industry at the time "had a fascist background."

Historian Alti Rodal, who investigated Canada's postwar immigration procedures, reported in 1986 that Canada permitted the entry of numerous individuals who had served with Nazi forces and their collaborators. Many were brought in because of a labor shortage, she wrote.

When asked to comment on the Star allegations in November, RCMP inspector George Watson said "we will try to get a hold of those files and have a look at [them] in the normal course of events."

Five months later, Deneault contacted The CJN with the RCMP's views on the story.

Justice Ministry seeks clarification on Finta ruling

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal Justice Ministry has joined Jewish organizations in asking the Supreme Court of Canada to clarify a controversial ruling in the Imre Finta case.

The Supreme Court ruled 4 to 3 in March that Finta, a former captain in the Hungarian gendarmes accused of sending 8,600 Jews to Nazi death camps in 1944, was not at fault for following orders he believed were legal, given the climate of anti-Semitism in the country at the time.

"Such a result is unacceptable in Canada and is wrong in law," wrote federal Crown Attorney Christopher Amerasinghe in a 12-page memorandum filed with the Supreme Court last week.

Amerasinghe, prosecutor in the Finta case since 1987, was acting on behalf of Justice Minister Allan Rock.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association petitioned the court April 25 for a rehearing of the case. The groups fear the ruling may set a dangerous precedent.

"The worst excesses of war crimes may be allowed if the decision says what it seems to say," said League for Human Rights lawyer Marvin Kurz.

"The Crown is supporting [the two groups'] applications," Amerasinghe confirmed from his Ottawa office.

Finta was acquitted by the Ontario Court of Appeal in 1992. The Supreme Court upheld that acquittal by accepting his defence of following orders an "air of reality" led him to believe were legal.

The Canadian Jewish Congress also filed a supporting memorandum with the Supreme Court last week. "We don't believe that the Court intended that anti-Semitism or racism could have been the basis for an excuse of following superior orders," said Congress national executive director Jack Silverstone.

It is rare for the Supreme Court to rehear a case, say lawyers familiar with the case. The Court can choose to ignore the petitions, issue supplemenatry written reasons for its judgment, or agree to a limited or total rehearing, the least likely possibility according to those involved.

No date has been set for the Court to address the petitions.

פון י. ב. זאַלצבערג

Demonstrators march in support of agunah

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Over 50 demonstrators marched in front of Vaughan Secondary School on Clark Avenue last Tuesday evening to show their solidarity with agunah Yoni Shalev, 42, and to demand that her estranged husband, Uzi, give her a get (Jewish divorce).

(Uzi is enrolled in an Israeli dance class held at the school on Tuesday evenings.)

Following the demonstration, flyers reading "UZI SHALEV, give your estranged wife a GET" and bearing his picture, were posted in a number of stores along Bathurst Street and in the Thornhill area.

The Shalevs were married in Israel 21 years ago and have been separated for three years. They have three sons, two of whom are in the Israeli army. The youngest lives with Yoni.

"People don't understand that when I ask for a divorce, it's not because I'm planning to get married again, or because I want to punish anyone," Yoni told The CJN. "It's for my soul. We have nothing in common any more. Why do I have to stay in this marriage?"

Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, chair of Toronto's Beth Din Tzedek, confirmed that he has spoken to Uzi "a number of times" and that Uzi says he is "not ready" to give a get.

When contacted by The CJN, Uzi Shalev said he had "no comment" on the protest nor on his reasons for not agreeing to the get.

Although Rabbi Ochs declined to comment on the Shalevs' case specifically, he allowed that "one has to try everything one can."

The Shalev protest was orchestrated by a Toronto volunteer who wishes to remain anonymous. She is helping Yoni and a number of other agunot who have not gone public in their quest for freedom, and worries about jeopardizing their confidentiality and safety should her name become known.

The protest is very likely the first of its kind in Canada. Neither Evelyn Brook, Montreal-based chair of the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, nor John Syrtash, Toronto lawyer and expert in gittin, has heard of another public denunciation of a recalcitrant spouse in this country, although there have been instances in the United States.

"This is what we've been speaking out for," Brook told The CJN. "As long as the case is clear, we're all for it. This is a real community response to the issue."

"It's sad that [the community has] to do this," said Syrtash, who attended the demonstration in an advisory capacity at the invitation of the organizer. He was heartened, however, to see the diversity of the crowd — Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Jews, ranging in age from students to seniors — who carried placards and wore yellow ribbons in sympathy for women held "hostage" in their marriages.

Rabbi Avram Rothman, director of Ohr Somayach, an Orthodox educational institution in Thornhill, attended the demonstration because "it's an important issue. [It's important] to show support...and let these women know we care about them."

Statistics on agunot are hard to come by. Israel alone has an estimated 10,000 agunot. A 1987 B'nai Brith Canada study reported that 311 Canadian cases involved "conflict or disagreement in procurement of the get" between 1982 and 1985. Currently, Rabbi Ochs is actively dealing with about half a dozen cases in Toronto. Syrtash says he has about 10 agunot as clients.

An agunah cannot remarry in accordance with Halachah. Should she remarry under civil law without obtaining a Jewish divorce, any children of that subsequent marriage are considered to be born of an adulterous relationship and are mamzerim under Jewish law. While they are halachically Jewish, they are forbidden to marry nearly all other Jews.

If a man remarries without giving his first wife a get, any children of his second relationship are not considered mamzerim on the basis of their father's status.

Only a husband can initiate a get. If a husband refuses to give his wife a get, she can never be divorced under Jewish law. If a wife refuses to accept the get, there are remedies under Jewish law, although it may be difficult to utilize them.

Canada's Divorce Act was amended four years ago to bar Jewish men from using the get as a bargaining chip in civil proceedings. Although a government report shows that 67 per cent of professionals such as lawyers and clergy report a "substantial improvement" because of the amendment, attempts to use the get as a negotiating tool are still common, said Syrtash.

He added that many lawyers are ignorant of the amended law, and noted that the Ontario Family Law Act has specific provisions regarding property rights which may be particularly helpful in cases involving agunot.

In the Shalevs' case, civil divorce proceedings were instituted only three months ago, because Yoni was not aware of the importance of a Canadian civil divorce, which is not recognized in Israel. Israel requires a religious divorce.

The issue of agunot "has to be dealt with by the entire community," said Glennie Lindenberg, president of Jewish Women's Federation (JWF). She expressed the hope that the protest would increase awareness of the agunah issue within the community.

"I hope [the vigil] will help me and other women who are not brave enough to do something like this," said Yoni, who confessed to feeling "a little bit nervous."

Supporter Jeremy Shapiro, a self-described happily married father of three, told The CJN he feels recalcitrant husbands "should be incarcerated until they [give a get], because it's a criminal act. No person has the right to keep another person captive."

JOURNEY TO OUR PAST
50 YEARS TO WAR END

Next year, 1995, marks 50 years of the end of World War II and the liberation of all Jewish prisoners in concentration camps in Europe.

To commemorate this very important historic event, preparations are already underway for large gatherings of survivors to be held mainly in Poland, the soil where the most horrible events took place.

SABRA TOURS IS ORGANIZING
A VERY UNIQUE ANNIVERSARY PACKAGE FOR BOTH
POLAND for "YOM HASHOAH - Holocaust Memorial Day" April 27, 1995
& ISRAEL for "YOM HA'ATZMAUT" - Independence Day, May 4, 1995

SABRA TOURS JOINTLY WITH THE CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS
in 1993 organized a very successful trip of the Jewish Community in Canada to Poland and Israel. The effects of this trip left lasting memories and marks on all who participated, and the entire trip was documented in a full length documentary film aired on TV Ontario just recently.

IF YOU ARE INTERESTED IN PARTICIPATING IN THIS UNIQUE PROGRAM JUST FILL OUT THE FORM BELOW AND MAIL OR FAX IT TO SABRA TOURS. WE WILL PUT YOU ON OUR MAILING LIST FOR PRIORITY REGISTRATION.

Syria among top of list of countries backing terrorism

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — While the U.S. State Department is earning praise from the pro-Israel community for keeping Syria on its annual listing of countries supporting terrorism, it is being accused by one Jewish group of underreporting the PLO's involvement in terrorist incidents.

The department's annual report on global terrorism, released last week, says PLO factions loyal to Yasser Arafat were responsible for "one, possibly two" acts of terrorism last year following the signing of the Israeli-PLO autonomy framework in September.

But the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA) maintains that the number is much higher.

The State Department's figures are contained in Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1993, its annual survey of terrorist groups and the incidents they perpetrated around the world.

The report, issued at a time when the United States is pushing hard for real progress in Israeli-Syrian peace talks, retains Syria on the list of state sponsors of terrorism, despite intense lobbying by Syrian President Hafez Assad.

Other countries listed as state sponsors of terrorism are Cuba, Iran, Iraq, Libya, North Korea and Sudan.

The report says members of Arafat's Fatah faction were responsible for the murder of an Israeli settler Oct. 29, and that an "alleged" member of the Fatah Hawks claimed responsibility for the murder of two Israelis on Dec. 31.

"In both cases, the responsible individuals apparently acted independently," the report says.

But ZOA President Morton Klein insists that Fatah has perpetrated 28 acts of terrorism against Jews and Arabs since the signing of the September accord, 16 of which occurred in 1993. Klein said his group bases its information on news reports from the Associated Press and The Jerusalem Post.

"I don't understand how the State Department could not have had these terrorism reports if we had them," said Klein, who added, "We verify every terrorist attack."

"We are concerned that the State Department report glosses over and excuses indications that the PLO may be unwilling or incapable of completing such a transformation" to live side by side with Israel.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations is studying the latest report and planned to meet with State Department officials last week to discuss it, said Malcolm Hoenlein, the group's executive vice chairman.

Violence decreased

The report says that overall, violence between Palestinians in the territories decreased in 1993, with 83 Palestinians killed by other Palestinians, compared to nearly 200 in 1992.

It attributes the decline in part to "a tacit cease-fire" between Fatah, the PLO's largest faction, and the Islamic extremist Hamas movement.

The report says 65 Israeli soldiers and civilians were killed and 390 wounded by Palestinian attacks in 1993. It also says "approximately 14" Palestinians were killed by Israeli civilians.

On the issue of Syria, the State Department concluded that, despite urgings from Damascus, the time had not yet come to remove the country from the terrorism list.

"There is no evidence that Syrian officials have been directly involved in planning or executing terrorist attacks since 1986, but Syria continues to provide support to and safe haven for several groups that engage in international terrorism," the report says.

It points out that several terrorist groups have training camps or other facilities on Syrian territory, including Ahmed Jabril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command.

But the report has some words of encouragement for Syria, stating that the country has "taken steps to restrain the international activities of some of these groups."

In particular, the report cites Syria's role in "cooling hostilities" in southern Lebanon last summer by inducing the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement to halt its rocket attacks on northern Israel.

The report also says that since last September's Israeli-PLO accord, "Syria has counseled Palestinian rejectionists to refrain from violence outside the region, although it has not acted to stop rejectionist violence in southern Lebanon."

It also notes that Syria continues to allow Iran to resupply the Hezbollah movement via its territory.

Overall, the report shows an increase in global terrorist attacks, with 427 incidents in 1993, compared to 361 incidents in 1992. The main reason for the increase was a jump in terrorist activities by the Kurdistan Workers Party against Turkish interests, the report says.

The only terrorist incident that took American lives last year was the February 1993 bombing of New York's World Trade Center, the report says. The bombing, which killed six Americans, was also considered by the State Department to be the only "international terrorist 'spectacular' " of the year.

U.S. department criticized

The State Department had little to say last week when asked about any possible discrepancies.

"A lot of hard work went into this report. We consulted as many sources as we could, and that's what we came up with," a department spokesman said.

But this is not the first time the department has been criticized for its reports on the PLO's link to terrorism.

In January, Sens. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Connie Mack (R-Fla.) wrote to Secretary of State Warren Christopher criticizing a progress report that had just been released on the PLO's compliance with a pledge to renounce terrorism.

The report "reads more like a defence of the PLO's lapses than a constructively critical guide to better behavior," the two senators wrote.

Russian officer stuck in jail

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Semyon Livshits, 35, a former officer of the Russian navy, is still languishing in a Vladivostok jail, despite evidence to the Russian Supreme Court that he was thousands of miles away from Vladivostok, where it is alleged he robbed 11 prostitutes and raped eight of them.

Livshits was once accused of a plot to hijack a Russian submarine and deliver it to Israel but the KGB dropped that charge against him.

He is jailed with 30 other prisoners in a cell meant for only eight and has lost his hair and most of his teeth and is reported to be suffering from malnutrition.

Although a new trial was held before the Vladivostok Military Tribunal, crucial evidence presented at the Supreme Court was withheld, including testimony from his ex-wife that he was not in Vladivostok, and the Tribunal again sentenced Livshits to 10 years.

His lawyer is appealing the decision again, this time to the Military Tribunal of the Supreme Court.

Believing that Livshits was prosecuted in the first place because he had decided to emigrate to Israel, the Soviet Jewry committee of Beth Tzedec Synagogue considers him a prisoner of conscience, and is appealing to the Canadian government to protest this miscarriage of justice.

"We have 8,000 signatures on a petition on Livshits' behalf, collected by Herb Landis, and have contacted Barry Campbell, the member for St. Paul's riding, and William C. Graham, MP, vice-chair of the Parliamentary Committee on External Affairs," said chair Genya Intrator.

Semyon Livshits

His parents. Vladlon and Eva, and his sister, Janna, live in Kiryat Shmona in northern Israel and Livshits is anxious to join them.

His father told Intrator in a telephone call from Israel that he believes the Vladivostok Military Tribunal reaffirmed its decision in order to save face, being unwilling to admit to their disregard for the rule of law and the corruption of their system.

Report leaves rabbis uneasy

"But the question in my mind is whether it is desirable in a public document to legitimate personal behavior that is non-normative from an ideal standpoint," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

He said the Canadian Conservative rabbinate is "very concerned about shifting borders on traditional sexual behavior away from biblical norms. I'm concerned with affirming traditional Jewish norms."

It also left "lots" of rabbis with "a strong feeling of discomfort," said Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in Toronto.

There's much that's positive in the report but it contains "tacit acceptance" of sex outside marriage, Rabbi Scheim said.

"That can open the door to potentially dangerous consequences. It's comparable to giving a person who keeps kosher guidelines on eating in a treif restaurant."

But the report likely won't aggravate tensions within the RA, said Rabbi Scheim, who's a member but also a vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism, founded in 1983 by those seeking to bring more conservatism to Conservative Judaism.

It wasn't only small-c Conservative rabbis who opposed the creation of the commission on human sexuality. The RA's sister organizations, United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism — the umbrella organization for congregations — and the Jewish Theological Seminary were both against the idea.

But a group of Conservative rabbis on the left of the movement calling themselves B'Tsalmenu (in our image), who sought to include gays and lesbians in synagogue life, pressed for the commission.

Rabbi Henry Balser of Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue said he is "torn" between his role as a guardian of Halachah and pastoral counsellor.

"It would be nice to live in a world like the Orthodox do, where if someone asks you what to do, you can say, 'This is what Jewish law says.' But that's not the reality in the Conservative world," Rabbi Balser told The CJN.

Rabbi Balser said he likes the report because it attempts to say something about "how people should try to relate to each other," and comes out forcefully for abstention for teenagers.

However, he was critical of the section on homosexuality because "it gives the impression of a bigger split on the law committee [than exists]. It would be a tragic mistake for rabbis to split and fight over the issue of homosexuality."

He said he suspects "a solid majority" of Conservative rabbis are squarely against ordaining open homosexuals and performing ceremonies of committment between homosexual couples.

The draft report was roundly denounced last week by the Union for Traditional Judaism and by the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America, which slammed the section on non-marital sex as "a betrayal of the sanctity of the Jewish home."

Excerpts

The following are excerpts from the report released by Conservative rabbis on human sexuality earlier this month:

On Suggestive Clothing:

We may dress in accord with the styles of the times, but never should our apparel accentuate the genital parts of our bodies. Thus, low-cut gowns or dresses and sexually suggestive swim wear for both men and women would not be in keeping with Jewish sensibilities.

On Denial of Sex:

The tradition does not approve denial of each other's sexual rights over a long period of time without due reason, for then the partner who wants to have sex is being denied the sexual expression of companionship to which each partner is entitled in a marriage.

On Adultery:

Adultery is prohibited by the seventh of the Ten Commandments, and is one of the three prohibitions which, according to the Talmud, one is not to violate even on pain of losing one's life ... Adultery does not necessarily mean the end of the marriage; that depends upon the people and the circumstances. Certainly all attempts at reconciliation should be made.

On Contraception:

Since women are not legally obligated to procreate and men are, contraceptive techniques used by women are more easily permitted than those used by men ... If couples are going to use contraceptives, Jewish law prefers those forms which prevent conception in the first place over those which abort an already fertilized egg ... Therefore, from a Jewish point of view, the diaphragm is the most favored form of contraception, for it prevents conception and has little, if any, impact on the woman's health.

On Condoms and AIDS:

In the age of AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, (condoms) should definitely be used whenever a risk of transmission exists. Furthermore, if either partner is afflicted with the HIV virus, whether through previous sexual encounters or through a blood transfusion, abstinence is necessary. For life must take precedence over the joys of sex.

On Non-Marital Sex:

Large numbers of people either will not or cannot get married, and the physical and psychological pleasures which sex provides lead them to engage in sex with each other. If that is the case, all of the concepts and values described (for married couples) apply to their sexual activities ... Committed, loving relationships between mature people who strive to conduct their sexual lives according to the concepts and values described above can embody a measures of holiness, even if it is not the full portion available in marriage.

On Fidelity:

Jewish values demand that one avoid short-term sexual encounters and seek, instead, long-term relationships to which one remains faithful for the duration of the relationship. Infidelity breeds pain, distrust, and, in the extreme, inability to form intimate relationships with anyone.

On Teenage Sex:

Teenagers need to refrain from sexual intercourse, for they cannot honestly deal with its implications or results — including the commitments that sexual relations normally imply, the possibility of children, and the risk of AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases. Abstinence is surely not easy when the physical and social pressures are strong, but it is the only responsible thing to do.

On Homosexuality:

The matter has become the source of deep controversy ... While affirming our tradition's prescription for heterosexuality, (we) 1) Support full civil equality for gays and lesbians in our national life, and 2) Deplore the violence against gays and lesbians in our society, and 3) Reiterate that, as are all Jews, gay men and lesbians are welcome as members in our congregations.

On Sexual Preference:

...Homosexual orientation, like heterosexual orientation, is the result of both nature and nurture ... Most health professionals, however, agree with the stance reaffirmed by the American Psychiatric Association in December, 1992, namely, that however it is fashioned, a person's sexual orientation is not a matter of choice.

On Gay Life:

Jewish homosexuals, like Jewish heterosexuals, should not be seen narrowly as people who engage in certain kinds of sexual practices, but rather as people and as Jews, with the full range of interactions that people and Jews have with each other.

My Sincerest Thank You

Your kindness, support and outpour of love has helped me through a most difficult time in my life. Each one of you is most special to me.

Your friend,
Paul Richmond

Choosing Village Park Was The Easiest Decision We Had To Make

▲ Alice Theimer and son, Peter Theimer

The decision to seek a retirement home for mother was the most difficult thing we've ever done. But while the decision to find a retirement home was difficult, selecting one was easy. Village Park won hands down. Nothing else compared. The friendly staff made us feel at home right from the start. And nursing care is customized so each resident's personal needs are met. We love Village Park. So does mother. That's the most important thing.

Mandela greets Weizman first after inauguration

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — Newly-elected South African President Nelson Mandela made a special gesture to Israel by meeting with Israeli President Ezer Weizman before greeting any of the other heads of state gathered for his inauguration ceremonies last week.

And the Israeli leader was paid additional, perhaps unexpected, attention when officials from several countries with which Israel has no diplomatic relations — such as Pakistan, Cuba and Sudan — came up to greet Weizman during the ceremonies.

After attending the inauguration, Weizman addressed Israelis living in Johannesburg and told them that Israel anticipates positive relations with the new leadership in South Africa.

He said the self-rule agreement between Israel and the PLO would augur well for warm ties between Jerusalem and Pretoria.

"There is a great understanding between the Palestinians and Mandela," Weizman told the audience. "They regarded each other as brothers in trouble, although there is a great difference here."

Weizman told how he had had a private conversation with Mandela, whom he described as having an active interest in becoming a sponsor of Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation.

After meeting with Mandela alone, the South African president then asked PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, who also attended the inauguration, to join them.

"He calls Arafat by his first name, Yasser," Weizman told the group of Israelis. "They embraced, and he said he and Arafat were brothers. I said: 'Then, Mr. President, we are cousins.' "

Weizman said the new South Africa will attempt to hold an important political and economic position not only in Africa, but throughout the world.

With respect to the role of the local Jewish community in the country, Weizman said Mandela "honestly speaks about regarding Jews as an element that will assist him in building the new South Africa."

In an effort to reach out and reassure South African Jews that they will have a place in the country's new political configuration, Mandela last Saturday visited the largest synagogue in the Southern hemisphere — Cape Town's Green and Sea Point Hebrew Congregation — to attend a Shabbat service.

The synagogue was packed with congregants who came to hear Mandela speak, and some members of the temple were sporting yarmulkes in the black, green and gold colors of the Mandela-led African National Congress.

Among the dignitaries at the shul were Israeli Ambassador Alon Liel; South African Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris; the congregation's spiritual leader, Rabbi Jack Steinhorn; and the national chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, Mervyn Smith.

At Tuesday's inauguration, Mandela also made a point of including the country's Jewish population in the ceremonies by having Rabbi Harris sit in the front row. That row also included other religious leaders, Mandela himself and Deputy Presidents Thabo Mbeki and F.W. de Klerk.

Rabbi Harris, who was among the Christian, Hindu and Muslim spiritual leaders attending the inaugural, read a message of peace from the prophet Isaiah before the crowd of 150,000.

In his inaugural address, Mandela also sounded the theme of peace, saying that South Africa was celebrating "a common victory for justice, for peace, for human dignity."

He called on the international community "to continue to stand by us as we tackle the challenges of building peace, prosperity, non-racialism and democracy.

"The time for the healing of the wounds has come. The moment for bridging the chasms that divide us has come. The time to build is upon us," said the man who had risen from being one of the world's best-known political prisoners to become his country's president.

Mandela pledged during his address to build a society based on egalitarian principles.

"We enter into a covenant that we shall build a society in which all South Africans, both black and white, will be able to walk tall, without any fear in their hearts, assured of their inalienable right to human dignity — a rainbow nation at peace with itself and the world.

"Never, never and never again shall it be that this beautiful land will again experience the oppression of one by another and suffer the indignity of being the skunk of the world," Mandela said.

The News in Brief

Yemen Jews Said Worried

JERUSALEM — The Jews of Yemen are extremely worried about the security situation there following continued clashes between forces from the north and south, but do not face any physical danger themselves, according to reports reaching the West.

The 800 to 1,000 community members are gathered in Sad'a in the north of the country, near the Saudi border, according to Shimon Avizemer of the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries. The rebels from the south have not attacked further north than the capital, San'a, he noted.

A group of Jewish community members have proclaimed their support for northern leader Ali Abdalla Salah, who is president of the united country of Yemen, Avizemer said. The Jews said they believe that the rebellion is no more than a passing episode.

Prisoners Refuse to Sign Pledge

JERUSALEM — Administrative detainees at Ketziot Prison here have refused to sign a document pledging their support for the peace process and promising to refrain from terrorism if released.

The prisoners claim they had been detained for their ideological, religious and political beliefs, which oppose the "proposed political settlement."

Prisoners denied being terrorists, describing their "struggle for liberation and independence as a legitimate and universally accepted means of resistance to the violent Israeli occupation."

They described authorities' request to sign the document as a "form of political and ideological blackmail, which involves trading beliefs and national dignity."

Weizman To 'Dialogue' With Diaspora

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Ezer Weizman will sponsor a two-day "dialogue" next month, aiming to break new ground in Israel's relations with Diaspora Jewry.

Weizman took the initiative because he feels that "both Israel and the Jewish communities should re-evaluate their relationship and identities," said Yossi Amrani, the president's political adviser.

In a recent letter, Weizman called the dialogue a "launching pad" for efforts to strengthen the Israel-Diaspora relationship, "and in this way to face the threat of assimilation."

"New bridges are needed," he wrote, "to prevent ourselves from drifting apart."

Some 200 participants have been tapped to attend, from intellectual, academic, political and artistic circles, and not just from "official" Jewish leadership. One third will be Israeli, while two thirds will be from the Diaspora.

N.A. Kids Stay Away

JERUSALEM — The perception that Israel is unsafe could prevent many North American teen-agers from visiting the country this summer.

According to officials at the World Zionist Organization, which coordinates dozens of Israel-based summer programs for Diaspora teens through its youth division, registration from North America is down 10 to 15 per cent from last year.

While officials stress that applications are still coming in, they concede that recent terrorist attacks have frightened away many American and Canadian kids who would otherwise be planning to spend this summer in Israel.

Second Arson Attack

AMSTERDAM — In the second arson attempt here in three months, a fire was started last week at the Jewish community centre in the Amsterdam suburb of Buitenveldert.

The fire, set May 5, was extinguished before any major damage could occur. Illegible graffiti was later found on the walls of the building, which houses a synagogue and offices of the Netherlands Ashkenazi Congregation.

On the evening the fire was set, a Jewish cultural event was to have taken place in the presence of the Israeli ambassador. The event was transferred to another venue.

The fire was set on Dutch Liberation Day, which marks the liberation of Holland from German occupation.

A similar arson attempt was made at the community centre in March.

Anti-Semitism No Longer 'Taboo'

BERLIN — German Jews are becoming increasingly worried that they are again being regarded as foreigners in their own country, according to the leader of Germany's Jewish community.

In a recent interview with the German weekly Deutsche Sonntagsblatt, Ignatz Bubis, chairman of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Germany, said that anti-Semitism has ceased to be a taboo in Germany.

Bubis said he is receiving more anti-Semitic mail than ever. He noted that he used to receive one anti-Semitic piece of mail for every 20 positive letters, but that now anti-Semitic material comprises one-third of his mail.

Bubis also said that when he visits Israel he is sometimes criticized for living in Germany.

In both countries, he said, "I declare myself as German."

Most Favored Touvier Trial

PARIS — The trial of Paul Touvier, the Vichy official convicted of killing seven Jews last month, was "necessary," according to most who responded to an opinion poll conducted here last week.

Touvier, 79, was sentenced in April to a life sentence for crimes against humanity.

As chief of the intelligence service of the French collaborationist militia in Lyon during World War II, he ordered the execution of seven Jewish hostages in Rillieux-la-Pape, near Lyon, in 1944.

According to the poll, 61 percent of French citizens interviewed favored the trial, while 32 percent opposed it.

There was less support for the trial among self-described observant Catholics, 40 percent of whom opposed the trial, with many of them saying it would "awaken old passions."

Touvier spent many years in hiding, some of them in monasteries, with help from high-ranking members of the French Catholic church.

Lutherans Reject Anti-Semitism

NEW YORK — The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America — the largest branch of the Lutheran church in the United States — has formally rejected the anti-Semitic writings of the movement's founder, Martin Luther.

Though never incorporated into official Lutheran doctrine, Luther's 16th century anti-Jewish diatribes have long been used by right-wing groups eager to give historical and religious justification to their anti-Semitic claims.

In its statement, the movement wrote that its members feel a "special burden" because of "catastrophes, including the Holocaust of the 20th century, suffered by Jews in places where the Lutheran churches were strongly represented."

"Grieving the complicity of our own tradition within this history of hatred," the declaration continued, "we express our urgent desire to live out our faith in Jesus Christ with love and respect for the Jewish people."

The April 18 declaration was issued in conjunction with the Lutheran World Federation.

Dead Sea Scrolls at Vatican

ROME — The Dead Sea Scrolls will be exhibited for the first time in Europe this summer, when they will be featured in a special exhibition at the Vatican opening June 30.

Italian newspapers said the exhibit will be opened by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Pope John Paul II.

The exhibition is described as the first major cultural event stemming from the agreement signed Dec. 30 opening the way to full diplomatic relations between the Vatican and Israel.

The exhibit will be arranged in cooperation between the Vatican Library and the Archeological Museum in Jerusalem.

Habla Ivrit?

SAN SALVADOR — El Salvador's tiny Jewish community has asked the World Jewish Congress for help in locating a spiritual leader.

The country's 50 Jewish families mark all holidays in a new community centre and synagogue. A leadership training course is offered to older youth and meets every Shabbat morning at the centre.

Some Jews returned to El Salvador after the signing of the 1991 peace accord. The community seeks a balance between Reform and Conservative trends.

The community seeks someone able to teach Hebrew and Bible classes; organize a Jewish kindergarten and supervise Jewish content of youth activities; teach bar and bat mitzvah classes; preside over marriages and funerals and lead services. A Spanish speaker is preferred.

Interested applicants may contact the WJC at 501 Madison Ave., 17th floor, New York, NY, 10022.

The choice: new peace strategy or party politics

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

For the last decade the world has been the scene of wide-ranging processes that have caught politicians and observers unprepared. While politicians try to adjust to the unknown and observers rush to interpret the trend, a significant part of the public everywhere, forgetful of its previous discontent with unchanging but stable situations, now shuns the prospects for change. But change has its own dynamic and creates new realities even if it is not supported by public consensus.

In the Middle East, where peace is now cautiously testing the ground, its very notion elicits irrational hopes in some circles and wild distrust in some sectors of Jewish and Arab national and religious fundamentalism. Much the same thing is happening to reform in the former Soviet Union. There "reform" has become an ugly word among the masses, manipulated by communist and nationalistic forces. In both cases, symptoms of withdrawal from the realities of the past are severe. In Russia, it is the sense that a feared and respected empire was lost through the betrayal of reformers. In the Middle East, adverse reactions are similar amongst Jews who feel that Eretz Israel was betrayed by the present government — and amongst equally bitter Arabs, who hoped against hope to regain all of Palestine and now believe that Arafat has sold them out to the Jews.

Yet, in both these very different political environments, the uncertainties of the present are the outgrowth of an unsustainable past. The future of the corrupt and messy Soviet Empire was as doomed as was apartheid in South Africa, as was the imposition of Israeli rule over the Palestinians. True, the breakdown of old orders alone is no guarantee that better ones are around the corner. It only indicates that what was is unlikely to be again, in any of these areas. To assimilate this elementary notion is one way to cope with the severe withdrawal symptoms caused by renewal.

Yeshayahu Anug

As one could see, the transfer of limited self-rule to the PLO in Jericho and Gaza was a complicated operation and it will take time to be fully completed. A preview of the differences ahead was offered by the curious ceremony in Cairo, which exposed to world television the distrust of which the new relationship is still made. More surprises and sporadic acts of violence by irresponsible opponents of peace on both sides are likely to put the uneasy process to new tests, but the general view is nevertheless that an emerging community of interests will play a role in overcoming new difficulties.

Now that for better or for worse what was contemplated as a start in Gaza and Jericho is under way, what should be Israel's next move?

Should it be directed at the Palestinians to use the momentum of progress? That would seem logical, since despite all the setbacks, the two sides know by now how best to handle each other. But the agenda is replete with large question marks about the future status of the autonomous entity, the refugees, the frontiers and East Jerusalem — to name a few. None of these issues is as intractable as it is now made to appear by the parties involved and they can be satisfactorily solved in constructive, if prolonged, talks, even without major foreign intervention or mediation. The trouble is, that on each of these issues the public positions of the parties seem politically irreconcilable. In view of the fragility of public support — on both sides — for what has already been accomplished between them, both may believe that it is perhaps politically wiser not to deal with these hot issues so soon. This could be a grave mistake since delays do not cool expectations, but — on the contrary — inflate them.

Yet, since politics counts everywhere more than interests, the fog may continue to obscure the course of future Israeli-Palestinian progress and the process may just linger on. If so, the parties risk losing their grip over their delicate relationship in its most critical, formative period. Gaza and Jericho are unlikely to be so successful a start as to guarantee calm for the prescribed lull of three years until the comprehensive solution can be hammered out. The over-reported euphoria in Gaza over the appearance of Palestinian policemen will soon pass. The surrounding misery will remain and will not be trumpeted away by parades and flags alone.

There is a school of thought in Israel which recommends to the government that they discuss the comprehensive solution with the Palestinians right away — and not just the details of limited autonomy. There is some support for this idea within the government itself. But the government may — for political and not for strategic considerations — choose now to direct its efforts to Syria, in the hope that President Hafez al-Assad will not reject the Israeli scheme allegedly conveyed to him recently by U.S. Secretary of State William Christopher. The plan, it is believed, provides for a sequence of withdrawals, security arrangements and peace-building steps to settle the Golan issue gradually over a number of years. Some observers believe that President Assad, being far more interested in improving Syria's relations with the United States than in a quick resolution on the Golan, may cooperate. If he does, the future of the Jewish settlements there will still make uncomfortable headlines, unmitigated by the idea that their probable dissolution could be slowed down considerably. Will the government prefer a political confrontation over the Golan settlements to one over those in the West Bank?

It may conclude that it is best to confront neither and this would be a classic non-choice, a wait-and-see policy adopted for non-confrontational purposes. But the political fallout of the results of the Histadrut elections may well reach beyond the foreseeable realignment within the Labor Party and affect the government's tactics in the pursuit of peace.

The 'battle for the environment' has begun in Israel

By SHOSHANA GABBAY

Alongside breakthroughs in the world of politics, economics and science, Israelis have been inundated with evergrowing doses of a different kind of news this year — environmental news. As a result of a government resolution to declare the current Jewish year (September 1993 to August 1994) the Year of the Environment, environmental protection is gaining entry into the consciousness of all segments of the Israeli population.

Officially launched on Sept. 6, 1993, Environmental Year began with a two-pronged ceremony: at the top of the Hiriya garbage dump in the Tel Aviv metropolitan area and at the president's residence in Jerusalem. The reason for launching Environment Year from atop Israel's largest landfill was explained by President Ezer Weizman himself: "The battle for the environment cannot be declared from an ivory tower; to understand truly the environmental challenges facing Israel today, planners and decision-makers must first see and smell the environmental nuisances which afflict the country."

At the official inauguration of the year at the president's residence, which was attended by numerous dignitaries and public representatives, a covenant was signed outlining Israel's commitment to environmental protection. "We hereby sign this covenant with the faith and conviction that our concern for our environment will represent a challenge calling out to every man, organization and group. May we have the chance to fulfill the special slogan of this year: To the Environment with Love."

Over the past several months, dozens of activities have taken place, their impact exceeding initial expectations. No day has gone by without media coverage of environmental issues, without environmental lectures, audio-visual presentations, happenings, exhibitions or clean-ups. Requests for environmental information have poured into the Ministry of the Environment by the thousands. Specially-prepared pamphlets, car stickers, posters, bookmarks and garbage bags for vehicles have been distributed to the general public. A "green diary," printed on recycled paper, was published to remind the public of environmental issues on a day-to-day basis.

Concrete activities have focused on several key projects in which the general public can take an active part. A nationwide battery collection drive, accompanied by a massive public information campaign, encourages the public to discard used batteries in specially-designed containers throughout the country (destined for final disposal in Israel's national hazardous waste site at Ramat Hovav).

A "green label" was designed and environmental criteria established to persuade manufacturers and importers to work toward environment-friendly products stamped with the green seal of approval. Several initiatives revolve around cleanliness in public places, especially along the coasts, beaches and roadsides. Special efforts are concentrated on closing down the rehabilitating garbage dumps, and new undertakings focus on separation at source, recycling and re-use.

Attention is being focused on the rehabilitation of the country's polluted rivers, and local authorities are working to improve new environmental and esthetic conditions in their jurisdiction. Finally, special efforts are being invested in increasing Israel's legion of volunteer anti-litter wardens, a unique Israeli innovation whereby cleanliness inspectors and trustees are appointed by the minister of the environment to help enforce the Cleanliness Law by reporting on littering offenses. The target by the end of the Environment Year: increasing their ranks from 48,000 to 250,000.

While the Ministry of the Environment stands at the forefront of activities, all government ministries are taking an active part in this mammoth environmental happening. Throughout the year, specific weeks are being devoted to such issues as transportation, health and tourism as these relate to the environment. Worthy of special note is the Ministry of Education, which has adopted the subject as the central theme of the formal education system this year.

The inauguration of the Year of the Environment in September 1993 coincided with new breakthroughs in the peace process. Environment Minister Yossi Sarid's words at the opening of the year ring as true today as they did several months ago: "As we inaugurate Environment Year, we stand at the gates of a special new year . . . a year of peace. Creating peace is our supreme moral responsibility to the generations to come. When our children sleep at night, we quietly tiptoe into their rooms to make sure they are safe, tuck them in and listen to their calm breathing. Tomorrow, we will be checking to see what they breathe. First we ensure life; then we ensure quality of life, the quality of the environment in which we live."

Will South African Jews make aliyah?

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Jewish Agency for Israel is poised to respond to any increased interest in aliyah among South African Jews in the wake of the African National Congress' election victory.

But it is being careful not to exploit the uncertainty some South African Jews feel in the face of their new and untested black leadership.

"This is a proper time to reassess our way of operating in South Africa," said Yehiel Leket, acting chairman of the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization.

But he said the Jewish Agency has "decided to adopt a policy of emphasizing the attractiveness of Israel" rather than of "warning Jews of the potential danger."

So, for instance, the agency is increasing the number of pilot trips it offers to Israel for South Africans considering aliyah.

And meanwhile it has established a "situation room" in Tel Aviv to facilitate up-to-the-minute monitoring of political developments in South Africa, which is home to 110,000 Jews, including 20,000 native Israelis.

But whether South African Jews will begin flocking to Israel remains unclear.

On the one hand, the transition to democratic, majority rule and the end of Pretoria's diplomatic isolation may usher in a new era of stability, one in which Jews feel they can "contribute to the upbuilding of a new South Africa," said Leket.

On the other hand, aliyah from South Africa has already increased from 200 newcomers in 1992 to a projected 1,200 in 1994. This is a "significant sign that many people feel it's the right time to come to Israel," he said.

Leket's sanguine approach to South African aliyah under the new regime contrasts with pronouncements by Hanan Ben-Yehuda, the Jewish Agency treasurer and chairman of its Committee for South African Affairs.

In recent articles, Ben-Yehuda has highlighted the potential for tension and upheaval during the new government's transition period.

He has predicted that many whites will be dismissed from key positions in the public sector, and he has warned that South Africa's Jews are already "fortifying themselves."

"A situation of uncertainty exists regarding the personal safety of the population," he said, noting that riots could be "instigated by extremists on both or either side."

Ben-Yehuda accused the Israeli government of having "failed to make South African Jewry a priority" because it wishes to maintain good relations with ANC leader Nelson Mandela, the country's first black president.

Yigal Antebi, director of the Israeli Foreign Ministry's African affairs department, defended the government's policy.

"We are following the developments very closely and are confident the elections were a success," he said. "It was a generally smooth process, and this reflects on the future as well."

"There is no panic, and no rush" to emigrate from among the "large, warm and Zionist community," in South Africa, he said. Indeed, "we believe our good contacts with the ANC will help the Jewish community in the near future, as well as the long run."

Antebi argued that Israel's recently improved posture among African nations — it has currently has full diplomatic relations with 32 of them — will also ultimately bode well for the Jews in South Africa.

Other Israeli officials have said that any aggressive "lobbying" for emigration from South Africa now, in the wake of the victory for democratic principles, is inappropriate.

"The greatest thing about Israel is that Jews know they always have a refuge, in case," said one official. "It gives them extra room to maneuver, because they can always pick up and go. All we have to do is let them know we're here and be prepared."

Leket said the Jewish Agency is working "in full cooperation with the government of Israel, and there is no contradiction between our policy (of aliyah) and the good relations we (Israel) have to develop with South Africa."

Leket spoke to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency following a conference call between members of the WZO Executive and Israel's ambassador to South Africa, Alon Liel.

Asher Cailingold, the head of the Agency's delegation in South Africa, also took part in the call, which was intended to inform the WZO and Jewish Agency about the atmosphere following the elections and their immediate impact on the country's Jewish community.

Ambassador Liel reported an atmosphere of celebration among the blacks and calm among the whites, along with an uncertainty over how well-prepared the ANC is to run the country.

The ultimate concern, he said, appears to be whether foreign investors will trust the new regime enough to put money into it and give the economy a healthy boost.

But there is no atmosphere of panic among the Jews nor a sudden increase in aliyah, stressed Cailingold.

Nonetheless, he reported a substantial increase in the number of people making serious inquiries about emigrating for Israel.

He said he believes they are responding more to the "pull" of Israel, however, than the "push" away from South Africa. Many South African Jews come to Israel on repeated visits, often on pilot trips for prospective olim sponsored by the Jewish Agency. During those trips, they often find jobs, which are the single most important factor in prodding them to make the final move, say agency officials.

While more pilot trips for South Africans are being planned, a resulting boost in aliyah rates is not expected this year, Cailingold said.

For every South African who leaves to go to Israel, three leave for other places, Cailingold estimated.

Leket told Liel he wishes the new South African government well and hopes for a continued strengthening of relations between Israel and South Africa.

Unqualified success

The United States Holocaust Museum in Washington has been an unqualified success — so much so that harried administrators have gone as far as to ask potential visitors to delay their visits. More than 800,000 people have passed through its portal since its opening a little more than a year ago, and reaction has been stupendous. According to a poll commissioned by its board, 95 percent of both Jews and Catholics said they had enjoyed the museum, while 92 percent of Protestant visitors registered their approval.

The large crowds have prompted the museum to hire more employees, at a cost of about $200,000. And the overcrowding, which has resulted in unexpected wear and tear, has reportedly forced the museum to request $12 million in additional funding from the federal government.

To perhaps the surprise, and certainly the delight of the Jewish community in the United States, the museum has become one of the most popular tourist destinations in the U.S. capital, as almost eagerly sought out as the profoundly moving Vietnam war memorial and the Smithsonian complex of museums.

The Holocaust museum is compelling and important for at least two reasons. It boldly debunks the hollow arguments of malevolent Holocaust deniers. And, more broadly, it poignantly jolts visitors into the realization that civility and decency in human relations cannot ever be taken for granted. Man's inhumanity to man is all too apparent, yesterday and today.

Fifty years ago this month, Adolf Eichmann and his Nazi cohorts were rounding up and transporting hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz. These events, as we all know, took place with the complicity of Hungary's regime and, let it be said, the indifference of most Hungarians. But Hungary, of course, was not the only country which betrayed and abandoned its Jewish citizens. History records these dark deeds.

Today, genocide unfolds in the remote and impoverished nation of Rwanda, while ethnic cleansing takes its bloody, obscene course in the former Yugoslavia.

Will we never learn? Will we always resort to physical force and racially-inspired myths to settle disputes?

If nothing else, the United States Holocaust Museum casts a pall over glib, facile assumptions that the human race is capable of resolving problems through peaceful means. Its graphic exhibitions, and the unspeakable story it tells, are cause for reflective pause in a world torn by endless strife.

An uncertain future

Two years ago, the small Jewish community of Rovne, a Western Ukrainian city, erected a stone memorial with the names, in Hebrew, of 17,000 Jews who had been murdered by the Nazis.

Daniel Sneider, reporting in The Christian Science Monitor (April 20), indicates that the memorial was built with the assistance of Yad Vashem, Ukrainian Jewish organizations and the Ukrainian Council of Christians.

Less than two years since it was erected, the memorial has now been vandalized — a fitting symbol, according to some, of the complex situation in which Jews in Ukraine find themselves.

Officially, the government of President Leonid Kravchuk has been very supportive of the 500,000 Jews in Ukraine. Under Kravchuk, Ukraine has returned synagogue properties to Jews, officially marked Jewish holidays and openly acknowledged that "horrible events took place here during the Nazi occupation period." Ukraine has also established diplomatic relations with Israel.

The obverse side of the coin shows, however, that Ukrainian Jews have been subjected in recent months to a wave of anti-Semitism, flowing primarily from extreme nationalistic groups.

One such group, the Ukrainian National Assembly, now has five seats in the Ukrainian parliament and its newspaper, The Voice of the Nation, regularly prints anti-Semitic cartoons and articles in which "international Zionism" (the code word for Jews) is joined to "cosmopolitanism," "Uncle Sam" and "Russian chauvinism" as menaces to Ukrainian society.

During the Demjanjuk trial some of these groups gathered at a Lviv synagogue carrying banners such as "All the gold of Ukraine is in the hands of Jews." This act is considered to be especially ominous because, according to historian Martin Gilbert, it was during the Nazi invasion of Western Ukraine that extreme nationalistic groups seized Jews and turned them over to the Nazi authorities.

As the Jews of Ukraine try to reconstitute, in Lviv and elsewhere, some semblance or organized Jewish life, they experience understandable anxieties. The fact that they wish to do so, in light of the Holocaust and current expressions of anti-Semitism is a triumph of the spirit over history.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

RED ALERT FOR 2021

As reported in The CJN (May 5), a number of public school boards have debated the issue of accommodating Jewish students because Rosh Hashanah will occur on the first day of the school year.

Unless some Hebrew calendar reform takes place over the next 646 years, this peculiar conjunction between the observance of Rosh Hashanah and the first day of the public school year will take place only 15 more times, its last occurrence being on September 8, 2640.

These are the years in which either the first or second day of Rosh Hashanah will be observed on the first day of the public school year: 1994, 2021, 2032, 2048, 2089, 2116, 2146, 2173, 2184, 2241, 2268, 2336, 2393, 2420, 2488 and 2640.

In view of the infrequency of that event, all of the public school boards that have made some accommodation for their Jewish student population and Jewish teachers are to be commended for demonstrating sensitivity to their religious needs.

TIME FOR POLES TO ACT

Re: Women try to overcome stereotypes affecting Jews, Poles (March 10).

I decided to let you know how I feel from first hand.

I am a senior citizen who experienced hate and beatings long before Hitler came to power. In the '30s, when I attended school, I was beaten almost every day just for being Jewish. I was in Poland until 1943 working in a factory.

I understand the two Polish women who are trying to come to an understanding between the Jews and the Poles, but it has to come from the top. As long as the Polish government will not return Jewish properties, there will not be an understanding between Jews and Poles.

The Czechs and the Slovaks are working on a way to return Jewish properties and the museum with artifacts, which was my dream. I wanted to write to President Vaclav Havel to return Jewish properties.

I am very happy and will thank him for that because it gives me hope that maybe the Polish government will do the same.

50 YEARS AGO

In your paper of May 5 (Montreal edition), you show a photo under the caption "Catch a rising star."

Please note, your assumption that this was BBYO's first ever variety show is just not so.

In the late 1940s the Montreal chapters AZA and BBG (B'nai Brith youth organization) presented a variety show for several evenings. The show was directed by two gentlemen who have unfortunately passed on, Moe Segal and Jack Shapiro.

The male singing star, who sang his own composition, was Phil Silver of Cote St. Luc.

At the time, BBYO was centred in a cottage on Jeanne Mance street between Fairmount and St. Viateur. The director was the late Abe Rabinowitz.

Somewhere in the records of B'nai Brith these proofs of a very talented variety show can be discovered in copies of the AZA-BBG News.

How do I know? I was editor of the paper and wrote several of the articles, plus a gossip column.

PAROLE IS RED HERRING

If there is merit to the popular demand that Jonathan Pollard's life sentence be commuted to time served — as all moral and decent people believe there is — then it is nothing short of madness to consider a moratorium of two years on the issue while Mr. Pollard continues to languish in prison.

Jonathan Pollard has already served twice as long as anyone else convicted of a similar offence in the history of the United States. In other words, he has paid his debt twice over for the one count of passing classified information to an ally that he was charged with. Having paid twice over, there can be no justification for keeping Mr. Pollard incarcerated for even one second longer. Those who would argue that yet another review, two years down the line, is an acceptable compromise, are cooperating with the administration in perpetuating what Appeals Court Judge Steven Williams termed "a fundamental miscarriage of justice."

Indeed, Mr. Clinton's statements concerning Mr. Pollard have virtually guaranteed that Mr. Pollard will never be paroled. The deck of powerful recommendations against parole is so thoroughly stacked, that the last card added by the president virtually guarantees that no parole board will ever have the audacity to rule differently.

In refusing Mr. Pollard clemency, President Clinton declared that he would not show clemency because of the alleged "harm" that Mr. Pollard had done to the United States. Harming the United States is an indictable offence. Mr. Pollard has never been indicted on such a charge. Mr. Clinton's statement is an affront to the integrity of all American citizens. After all, it has never been "the American Way" to jail people on false charges with neither indictment nor benefit of trial.

By lending his support to the prejudical and fraudulent damage assessment of a discredited and anti-Semitic intelligence regime, Mr. Clinton has abdicated the constitutional responsibility of his office; and that is to guarantee that all branches of the administration operate within the law, and free of racial or political bias.

In short, parole for Jonathan Pollard is a red herring that simply clouds the issue. It means that another two years will elapse before the battle for truth and equal justice for all under the law begins in earnest again. There is no sane or moral reason to delay. Justice delayed is justice denied. Anyone willing to wait another two years before driving this point home to the current administration — that all citizens must be treated fairly and equally under the law — must either be morally misguided or simply mad!

Making it into the top 100

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

My old friend Gabriel Cohen, editor of the National Jewish Post and Opinion, recently came up with an editorial that I feel I must share with you. It tells of a new book — a low in Jewish publishing.

If you go to a library that contains Jewish books, you will probably find some which tell you about the most important personages in Jewish history. There are always names on which everyone agrees, and some unusual ones of which the reader will say: "If it had been my choice I would have written about . . ." It all depends how many people are listed in the book — and the more choices there are the greater the disagreement. The whole thing is a harmless exercise in bringing important historical names to the attention of readers.

So what is new in this line of business? Mr. Cohen acquaints us with the latest effort of some New York genius who has managed to publish a tome which is straightforwardly called The Top 100.

Now of course, you are biting your fingernails to find out who is in it and who is not. Mr. Cohen has relieved me of the need to look for the book itself, because his brief editorial tells me all I need to know.

Rabbi Plaut

Moses leads the group — no surprise there. Then in the order of his listing come Jesus, Albert Einstein, Sigmund Freud Abraham and Saul of Tarsus (the St. Paul of Christian tradition).

No one can deny that — aside from the theological problems it has — this is a pretty impressive list. But we are not up to 10 yet and you will be happy to know that amongst the next five are Theodor Herzl and Anne Frank, who is closely followed by King David. Oh yes, Baruch Spinoza beats them all.

But wait; the author has just begun to unravel his ball of surprises. Were you aware that Harry Houdini, the magician, Groucho Marx, the comic, and Benny Goodman, the band leader, also have changed the world? Even Bob Dylan is listed, although I am not at all sure that he still considers himself a Jew. The author lists revolutionaries like Emma Goldman, and actress Sarah Bernhardt; and Henry Kissinger rubs shoulders with Sandy Koufax, the pitcher.

Now you know already that you will be instructed in many ways — including some you did not know about. I don't object to having people investigate whether the mathematician John Ludwig von Neumann was a Jew and claim that the French novelist Marcel Proust also deserved a listing (to be sure his mother was Jewish, but he was raised as a Roman Catholic, and his Jewish memory extends to the fact that he remembers that a pebble was placed on his grandfather's grave).

To my immense relief, I myself am not included (and neither is Gabe Cohen) — but then even such cornerstones of Jewish life as Rashi, the Rambam (Maimonides), and the Baal Shem Tov (the founder of Chassidism) are not either. On the other hand, you will be relieved to know that the 17th century's false messiah, Shabbetai Zevi, is in the list of the Jewish august. One of his achievements no doubt was that he managed to convert to Islam and still make it into this latest book of immortals.

One of my late father's favorite books in the Tanach was Kohelet. In one of its last verses it says: "Of the making of books there is no end." He knew what he was talking about.

Research, not sympathy, is needed to defeat AIDS

Special to The CJN

The name of the author of this article has been withheld by The Canadian Jewish News to protect his privacy.

I like to think that the panel discussion on AIDS: Reality and Responsibility held recently at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue represents a positive step in the Jewish community's finally recognizing the importance of AIDS and HIV, which continue to ravage our community. While I was not present at the event, as a Jewish gay man who is also HIV positive, I have some comments to add based upon your reporter's coverage of the event.

I am deeply disturbed at the amount of hand wringing and calls for compassion that appear to come from those in the "front lines" of AIDS. Too often, I fear that such discussions on AIDS only serve to reinforce the global view that HIV=AIDS=DEATH. Given that the audience who go to discussions such as those held by Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am likely have little or no knowledge of AIDS, its possible origins, pathophysiology, treatment options and research, I feel that conclusions highlighting "compassion" as the only option for Jews touched and concerned by HIV and AIDS are limiting at best and potentially dangerous at worse.

In my view, after ten years, research into AIDS continues to be totally uncoordinated; marked by fractious, competitive and combative relations among physicians, scientists, investigators and pharmaceutical companies.

Because private and government grants to universities and other public scientific institutions have dwindled to dangerously low levels, the majority of research in the field has been left to the competitive private sector, namely the pharmaceutical industry. As a result, the majority of research being undertaken is towards a "one stop" cure. This in itself is a dangerous postulate which may have cost society valuable time.

Further, because such a "magic bullet" has not been found and appears unlikely to be found in the near future, the majority of front-line physicians dealing with HIV and AIDS have become eternal pessimists. I say majority because thank God there are a few (too few) practitioners who are truly searching and working with their patients to keep them alive and healthy, rather than following guidelines (often poorly written and researched by the medical, commercial press) and waiting for their "messiah" in the form of a "vaccine" or a "pill" to come.

Given the carnage brought about by AIDS, which so many committed practitioners have had to deal with every day of their professional lives, such negative feelings are understandable. However, to communicate the sort of completely negative view suggested by the participants of the discussion held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am is unfair and unwise and, many would argue, simply not true.

While personally, I am not an outrageous optimist about my chances of remaining healthy and symptom free indefinitely, I believe that there have been surprising and hopeful developments, which I feel are not communicated to the general population about HIV and AIDS and should be — quickly. They may save some lives and prolong others.

There are too many unanswered questions when dealing with AIDS to come to the conclusion that every person infected with the HIV virus will die; questions pertaining to whether HIV itself is the sole cause for a person developing AIDS. Increasingly, more and more investigators who, five or ten years ago, rejected this hypothesis are now taking a second look at this hypothesis, which opens up a great deal of important and unexplored territory.

Non-pharmacologic compounds, vitamins and other supplements have been keeping people alive for longer and longer periods of time. This development also raises questions about the direction of research into the treatment of HIV — questions many AIDS researchers steadfastly refuse to recognize or acknowledge, particularly because they do not emerge from the established medical authority. All too often when pressed, physicians pass off such developments as too "anecdotal;" not fitting into the forms of "studies" which have become the only standard many physicians will recognize (conveniently forgetting that many such studies are funded largely by drug companies who need such studies to justify often weak claims of efficacy). And these are but two examples of what needs to be considered in the overall picture towards treating HIV and AIDS.

If there is anything that those in the Jewish community who care about AIDS can do, it is not just to provide comfort to those affected by HIV, but to take an activist, positive stance towards defeating AIDS. The community should insist that governments spend AIDS dollars not merely on slick, costly "prevention programs," but actively and aggressively fund research to universities and other non-profit organizations — where the vast majority of medical breakthroughs have been found in the past. The community should press our government, in fact all governments around the world, including Israel (who in small ways has done some marvellous research into AIDS), to initiate a coordinated effort to conquer AIDS — an effort which would involve the pharmaceutical industry; bringing about a more open and cooperative environment than exists now.

In my opinion, and I will be the first to admit that I am biased, to do less is to allow this epidemic to continue and to move it ever closer to the stature of an unprecedented human tragedy which future historians may equate with the plagues of the Middle Ages. I believe this is what AIDS will be termed if the number of cases continues to rise, particularly outside the homosexual community.

I, like many others infected, do not necessarily want help with a "good death" (one that benefits survivors more than the person dying), and we are definitely not comforted by the recommendations made by spokespeople based on their despair at being at the front lines for so long.

I despair at so much effort and support being given to perpetuating AIDS as an incurable disease. It may do more to kill people infected with HIV faster than the disease itself.

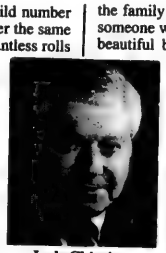
My grandchildren the miracle makers

By JACK CHISVIN

What do grandparents and grandchildren have in common? The parents of course. It is recognition of this common enemy that prompts grandparents to enter into an alliance with their grandchildren. When my first grandchild arrived, it was my personal reinvolvement in the mystery of birth that cemented the bond between us. When the second and third appeared on the scene, four minutes apart, it was the incomprehensible marvel of twins that led to my strong attachment. But as numbers four, five, six and seven joined the ranks, I realized that it was something more than that — I was closer to the moment of birth with my grandchildren than I was with my children.

I played my role in the act of conception and vicariously shared my wife's pregnancy. But when the time came to deliver, my part was abruptly ended. I was left standing at the hospital admitting desk while my wife was wheeled down the corridor. Hours later a nurse advised me that I was a father and I was permitted to look through a window into a nursery full of basinettes. The nurse pointed to one at the extreme end of the room indicating it was mine. The next day, gowned and masked, I finally held my child. With each of my grandchildren I was there, cradling that precious life in my arms within minutes of birth.

A few weeks ago grandchild number four had his sixth birthday party and grandchild number five had his fourth birthday party later the same day. As at every family simchah, countless rolls of film were shot and the ever-present video camera recorded each minute of the day. The celebrants, pleased to be the centre of attention were nevertheless reluctant subjects of all the picture taking.



Jack Chisvin

Being available for picture taking is one of the fine-print clauses in a parent-baby contract. Gratefully, sooner or later this contractual arrangement becomes unenforceable. Posing for baby pictures is the second of two indignities newborns have to suffer. The first is the resounding slap on the rump every baby receives immediately upon arrival. Although that unprovoked attack is traditional, it certainly is not one of the biblical moments when we are advised to turn the other cheek.

I have a pediatrician friend who pleads for gentleness with the newborn. He declares that an infant arrives with all its systems functioning and is not a lump of stuff to be turned upside down and slapped. He leads the cause for infants' rights and zero tolerance of physical force in our treatment of children.

As my grandchildren's pictures were being taken I wanted to warn them that it will serve no good purpose. Someday, years from now, when the family album is put on display for visitors, someone will invariably say, "You were such a beautiful baby. What happened to you?" My grandchildren won't be able to deny that it's their picture. One look at the bemused smile on their faces and the look in their eyes will suggest that they decided to go along with the imposition even though they may have been thinking otherwise. If taking a picture will make their parents happy why shouldn't they show they understand the problem. After all, they will be in this thing for a long time.

Togetherness and understanding are the two required ingredients for a family to live in harmony and equanimity. The reason family life is now so much in disarray is that most kids seem to be born rebellious — but smart. The thing my grandchildren must remember is that the people they moved in with were as newly born to parenthood as they were to childhood. Their parents were only a handsome young married couple and a miracle was needed to make them a family. Children were that miracle, so on their birthdays, I asked my grandsons, two of the miracle makers, to take a bow. Their sainted great-grandfather and great-great-grandfather for whom they were named would applaud.

The picture taking business is not a baby's priority. Babies plan their days to be full with resolving more pressing infancy problems: practising burping without being savagely thumped on the back, learning how to pretend to be asleep so as not to be goo-goo'd, kicking their toes in the air and checking them out to see that they haven't flown off, attempting to capture a small circle of sunbeam on the blanket, then uncurling their fingers and finding nothing there, just a little handful of whimsy. That's a lesson they shouldn't forget. It will happen again, when they grow up, and reach out to close that big deal and then open their adult fist and again find only a handful of nothing.

There were times when I gave my grandchildren gifts that I would ask them to hide. I didn't want the parents complaining about a meddling grandfather trying to subvert their children. Parents tend to become unreasonably possessive. But on their birthdays, the presents could be exposed — they were chosen with parental approval in mind.

Enjoy your birthdays, Joshua Samuel and Michael Jeffery, I thought. Your years to date were a breeze, but life is not always pizza, birthday cake and presents. Your parents won't always be so accommodating. There will arise instances when you don't see eye to eye, which will drive one of them to shout, "If you don't like it here, why don't you go back to where you came from!" And at times you may wish you could, but happily you can't, for together with your siblings and cousins, you are your grandparents' immortality.

'The right of return'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The "right of return" is a clarion call of the Palestinian national movement. Boiled down to its essence, the phrase denotes the longing of Palestinian refugees displaced by the 1948 Arab-Israeli war to return to their original homes in what is now Israel.

For decades, their plight topped the Arab political agenda and was a primary source of tension between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

If not for this troubling issue, Israel could have made peace with the Arab world long ago.

Last September's historic accord for limited Palestinian self-rule, signed by Israel and the PLO, is bereft of references to the "right of return," although PLO leaders have spoken of the need to repatriate some Palestinian refugees.

In 1949, during the Lausanne peace conference, the Israeli government succumbed to U.S. pressure and invited 100,000 Palestinian refugees to Israel. The offer was rejected, and since then, it has not been repeated. Nor, in all probability, will it ever be. Were Israelis to accept the Palestinian demand for the "right to return," Israel would be reduced to a binational state, with all its manifold problems.

Obviously, this argument cuts no ice in many Palestinian circles, and this explains why certain radicals, notably George Habash and Ahmad Jibril, vehemently reject Yasser Arafat's accord with Yitzhak Rabin.

For a better understanding of the "right to return" concept, a reader should delve into three recently-published books which, directly and indirectly, address this burning topic.

The first, The People of Nowhere (Random House, $9 US), is by a reputable Israeli journalist, Danny Rubinstein, who writes for Ha'aretz. The other two, Before Their Diaspora ($29) and All That Remains ($59), are published by the Institute For Palestine Studies in Washington.

Meticulously researched, the volumes under review illuminate the Palestinians' yearning for a life and an era that have vanished.

When the dust of Israel's War of Independence finally settled, a mass movement of Arabs had been unleashed. In newly-born Israel, 160,000 Palestinian Arabs had remained behind, the nucleus of the present Israeli Arab community. Meanwhile, hundreds of thousands of Palestinians had been dispersed to the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Arab world and elsewhere.

According to Rubinstein, the refugees from the Galilee resettled in Lebanon, Syria and the Jenin district of the West Bank, while those from the centre of the country went to Nablus, Tulkarem, Ramallah and East Jerusalem. Palestinians from the south turned to Gaza and the Hebron area. With the passage of time, some of the refugees made their way to Jordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and other Arab countries.

The refugee camps, which Rubinstein describes as "the consciousness of exile," were filled mainly by the Palestinian lower classes. The middle class, and particularly Palestinian Christians, gravitated to towns.

But no matter who they were and what they had been, all Palestinians shared a longing for their former homeland, and regarded their exile as merely temporary. All too often, they guarded the keys to their houses and the deeds to their land, clinging to "the memory of stolen honor" and glorifying their "lost paradise."

Before Their Diaspora, with an introduction and commentary by distinguished historian Walid Khalidi, is essentially a vivid photographic history of the Palestinians from 1876 to 1948. The chronology is deliberate. The earliest known photographs of Palestinians date back to the 1870s, when the stirrings of Zionism in Eastern Europe began.

Khalidi demolishes the myth that Palestine was an "empty land" when the first wave of Zionist immigrants arrived in 1882. The Palestinian inhabitants lived in a score of cities and towns and more than 400 villages. The Palestinians, he writes, formed "a proud and vibrant" community. By his estimate, 60 per cent of the 700,000 Arabs of Palestine were rendered homeless by the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Jews are puzzled as to why the Palestinian leadership rejected plans by the British Mandate authorities and the United Nations to partition Palestine. Walidi explains the Palestinian viewpoint rather cogently.

Finally, though, the 474 black-and-white photographs scattered through the 351 pages of Before Their Diaspora leave the greatest impression. They comprise an eclectic collection of nostalgia and strife: pastoral rural scenes of Palestinian settlements, glimpses of British dominion, snapshots of Arab rebellion, vignettes of Jewish emigration, formal portraits of sombre Palestinian dignitaries (including the father of the first chairman of the PLO, Ahmad Shukairi.)

All That Remains, edited by the same Khalidi, is a massive documentary record of Palestinian villages in Israel occupied, depopulated and wiped off the face of the map during the 1948 war. It is a collaborative effort by the Institute For Palestine Studies, Birzeit University on the West Bank and the Galilee Centre for Social Research in Nazareth, Israel.

Within pre-1967 Israel, 418 Palestinian villages were destroyed and depopulated, while about 100 remained untouched. Khalidi claims that over 80 per cent of the lands owned by Israeli Arabs were confiscated and put at the exclusive disposal of Israel's Jewish citizens.

Khalidi's information about Palestinian settlements is gleaned from the Palestine Index Gazetter, compiled by the British in 1945. Apart from 13 villages in closed military areas and one engulfed by an Israeli settlement, the sites of all the villages listed in All That Remains were visited.

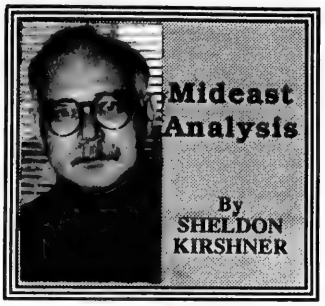
The team of researchers went to former villages in 14 districts throughout Israel, from Acre and Beersheva to Jaffa and Jerusalem.

Under each listing, there are the following subheads: location, average elevation, land ownership and use in 1944/45, population, number of homes, the village before 1948, occupation and depopulation, Israeli settlement on village lands, and the village today.

The descriptions of the villages are dry and factual, and supplemented by maps.

In short, All That Remains may be the most comprehensive account of Palestinian village society prior to 1948. It's not propaganda, but it is an eye-opener.

Palestinian children in a Gaza refugee camp.



It has finally happened.

Israel and the PLO have at last activated the first phase of the Declaration of Principles (DoP) — the historic agreement on limited Palestinian autonomy in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho which could yet lead to a Palestinian state.

Nearly eight months after the startling handshake in Washington sealing the DoP — the blueprint outlining Israel's rapprochement with the PLO — Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat met in Cairo and signed the landmark accord. They failed, however, to clear up a major disagreement over the size of the Jericho enclave.

The agreement that was promulgated on May 4 should have been wrapped up on April 13, the deadline for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all but Jewish settlements in Gaza and the Jericho area. But, as Arafat learned time and time again, Rabin was not overly concerned with meeting "sacred" deadlines.

Being a stickler for details, and responding to his own instincts for ensuring that the agreement met the strictest requirements of Israel's security needs, the stolid Israeli prime minister hewed to his own well-defined agenda.

Besides, the Palestinians themselves would not have been ready for a transfer of authority on April 13. They were simply too disorganized, and may still be.

March toward peace

The agreement — which is supposed to be followed by elections for a Palestinian self-governing council on July 13 — is clearly a milestone. It may yet yield peace treaties with several countries in the Arab world, notably Syria, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco and Oman.

However, this process is expected to be incremental and, in Syria's case, dependent on Israel's willingness to withdraw from the Golan Heights in its entirety.

Whatever transpires in the future, Israel learned at least two hard lessons from its arduous negotiations with the PLO.

The DoP — the product of secret talks in Norway — was a visionary document rather than a nuts-and-bolts accord, and therefore, many blanks had to be filled in. This caused numerous misunderstandings, interminable delays and recriminations.

On the Israeli side, the talks designed to implement the DoP were initially placed in the hands of the military. This was done after Chief of Staff Gen. Ehud Barak complained that the DoP was full of holes from a security point of view. Amnon Shahak, the deputy chief of staff, launched the negotiations in the Egyptian resort of Taba. There were problems, and the talks moved to Cairo. Trying to break the deadlock, Rabin and Arafat met last December at a summit hastily arranged by President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, but they failed to resolve the impasse.

At this critical juncture, the Israeli Foreign Ministry, which had hammered out the DoP, stepped in. In a bid to translate the DoP into a living, breathing agreement, Peres held a series of meetings with top-level Palestinian officials, including Arafat, in Oslo, Paris, Cairo, Davos and Bucharest. These encounters were helpful in narrowing the gap in their respective positions.

Israel also learned, yet again, that rejectionists on both sides of the divide will do everything in their power to sabotage the march toward peace.

From the outset, the talks were buffeted by Arab and Jewish terrorism, evidence of the fact that neither Israel nor the PLO can suppress this deadly phenomenon.

Nearly 50 Israeli civilians and soldiers have been killed since the DoP came into being on Sept. 13. Hamas, the Palestinian Islamic movement, has been responsible for many of the cold-blooded murders. But Fatah, Arafat's faction in the PLO, has had a hand in the bloodshed as well.

Israeli settlers in the territories have also wreaked havoc, with the Feb. 25 massacre perpetrated by Baruch Goldstein in Hebron having been the most grisly incident of its kind.

Terrorism, and the heretofore lack of progress in implementing the DoP into a vibrant reality, have eroded support for the peace process, in both Israel and the territories.

Yet the show goes on, as it must, as Israel and the Arabs move cautiously but inexorably toward the promised land of peace.

Jerusalem's 3,000th birthday

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Jerusalem celebrated the 27th anniversary of its reunification on May 9, but officials here are already looking well past that date to Jerusalem's 3,000th birthday.

That celebration is still two years off, but city officials are already planning for an onslaught of tourists.

A joint effort of the municipality, the Ministry of Tourism, the Jerusalem Foundation and scores of other institutions, the anniversary celebrations are expected to draw some 2 million visitors throughout 1996.

City officials are looking ahead — not only to the trimillennium but to the nation's 50th birthday in 1998.

Additionally, the year 2000, revered by Christians as the second millennium, is expected to bring an unprecedented number of pilgrims to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and scores of other Christian holy sites both in and outside Jerusalem.

With too few hotels to accommodate the million-plus people who visited the capital last year, city officials and the Ministry of Tourism are scrambling to build another 10,000 rooms within the next few days.

To meet the demand for accommodations, the government has agreed to give financial incentives to private investors wishing to build hotels.

And many Jerusalemites hope to turn a profit by renting out rooms in their apartments.

Those visitors lucky enough to find a place to stay in or near the city will have a wide range of cultural events to choose from. Though the schedule is not yet complete, the trimillennium promises to be a year-long extravaganza.

To ensure that the event will be Israeli in character, the organizers have commissioned special works from the country's leading composers, choreographers and artists.

Several of the musical and dance events will be held outdoors, some in the ancient Sultan's Pool outside the Old City walls, and along the breathtaking tayelet, or promenade.

Though many of the events, such as a performance of Verdi's opera Nabucco (Nebuchadnezzar in Italian — the Babylonian king who conquered Jerusalem in 586 BCE), will cost an entrance fee, dozens of others will not.

Hundreds of gospel choirs from the United States have been invited to sing in the city's squares and parks. Other free events will include a parade through the streets of Jerusalem by thousands of marchers and musicians, many dressed in historical garb.

And a huge sound-and-light show, to be viewed from a hillside promenade overlooking the city, will depict Jerusalem's history.

The city is also sponsoring an art contest called Children Draw Jerusalem, which is expected to elicit hundreds of thousands of drawings from kids around the world.

According to Ze'ev Birger, a member of the planning committee, Diaspora Jewish communities will play a major role in marking the anniversary.

In addition to running a series of special programs to teach children and teen-agers the history of Jerusalem, the communities are expected to sponsor the trips of thousands of teens who wish to visit Israel in 1996.

Though they are reluctant to say so publicly, those involved in Jerusalem tourism are equally eager to attract Israeli tourists, many of whom have not visited the capital since the start of the intifada, the Palestinian uprising, six years ago.

According to an internal municipal report prepared in late 1993 by former Mayor Teddy Kollek (but only released this past March by Mayor Ehud Olmert), more than 50 percent of Israelis are afraid to visit Jerusalem.

Though extremely safe by the standards of most Western cities, Jerusalem suffers an image problem, conceded a local tour guide.

As such, Jerusalem officials are banking on the Palestinian autonomy plan to bring an end to the intifada — and to bring back tourists in time for 1996.

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

In this week's sidrah we read about the laws of the Nazirite. A person wishing to become holy took upon himself certain restrictions imposed by the Torah. He couldn't drink wine or beer or like drink; couldn't cut his hair; couldn't defile himself by coming in contact with the dead (even those relatives to whom a kohen could defile himself under certain circumstances). Then at the end of the period of nezirus, there were definite obligations to perform such as cutting his hair and offering certain korbonos (sacrifices). Of course, anyone embarking on such an undertaking, was going to make sure that in addition to all of the external requirements mentioned above, during the whole period of being a Nazirite he would undertake to reflect upon his deeds, repent, and come closer to Hashem. And indeed, it would seem that it was a praiseworthy action for one to undertake this period of wanting to elevate himself spiritually, whatever the reason that compelled him to do so.

Yet, interestingly enough we read, "And the kohen shall offer the one (turtle dove or pigeon) for a chatas (sin offering), and the other for an olah (elevating offering), and shall atone for him for the sin he committed against the soul . . ." (Numbers 6: 11). On this the Talmud (Nedarim 10a) comments that Rabbi Elazar haKappar considered the Nazirite as a sinner, for against which soul had he sinned? His own, because he afflicted himself through abstention from wine (which is normally permitted). Now we can make a kal v'chomer (even more logical conclusion) if one who only abstains from wine is a sinner, how much more so one who ascetically refrains from everything. Hence one who fasts is called a sinner."

In the beginning of parshas Kedoshim the Ramban (Nachmanides) states his famous words that one must abstain from overindulging in even permissible acts, for overindulgence could lead one to becoming a "naval birshus haTorah — a degenerate with the permission of the Torah."

The Torah's view is summed up in the famous words of the Rambam (Maimonides) who declares in Hilchos Deios (chapter 1:3-4): "The extremes of any temperament are not a good path to follow . . . rather the right path to follow is the middle path (the golden mean) . . ."

The Torah has never encouraged asceticism. The very first mitzvah mentioned in the Torah is "to be fruitful and multiply" — to marry, raise a family, and live among society. The Torah was not given to malachim (angels) as the Kotzker Rebbe said, "V'anshei kodesh tiheyu lee" — holy men but not angels. Conjugal relations are not only permitted but a mitzvah. But the Torah still commands very strong controls over permitted sexuality, and tzenius (Jewish modesty) reigns supreme in all public matters of overt mingling of the sexes, as well as in private.

At every Jewish simchah — a bris, a wedding, a pidyon haben, a bar mitzvah — on every Shabbat and Yom Tov, not only are we permitted to drink wine, but it is a mitzvah to make kiddush (the blessing) and to drink the wine (or to have a schnapps after the fish before continuing with the meat). But as the late Rabbi Rosenberg of Savannah, Georgia once said: "If you have God as a drinking partner you'll never make a fool of yourself."

Hashem has created this world and he wants us to enjoy it. But our only condition is that as we enjoy it, we use it in His service. Enjoyment for the sake of pure physical indulgence without God somewhere in the picture is hedonism and can lead to becoming a "naval."

One of the great rabbis once explained that when you are sent on a mission by your company, there are normal expenses that are incurred and the tab is picked up by the company. All expenses which are necessary fall under this category. You have to sleep somewhere, you have to eat, you have phone expenses to the office, etc. But there are many other expenses that a traveller sometimes chooses to incur which are not required for the completion of his mission. These expenses are on your tab, and can't be billed to the company. When we are working for the Boss (the Almighty) there are natural expenses that the company pays. But when we are self indulging and enjoying ouselves, and not working for the Boss, then we are going to have to pay heavily for these non-vital expenditures.

Mark Twain once wrote the following about the Jews: "If the statistics are right, the Jews constitute but one per cent of the human race. It suggests a nebulous dim puff of the stardust lost in the blaze of the Milky Way. Properly, the Jew ought hardly to be heard of, but he is heard of, has always been heard of. He is as prominent on the planet as any other people, and his commercial importance is extravagantly out of proportion to the smallness of his bulk. His contributions to the world's list of great names of literature, science, art, music, finance, medicine and abstruse learning are also way out of proportion to the weakness of his numbers. He has made a marvellous fight in this world in all the ages; and has done it with his hands tied behind him. He could be vain of himself and be excused for it. The Egyptian, the Babylonian and the Persian rose, filled the planet with sound and splendor, then faded to dreamstuff and passed away. The Greek and the Roman followed and made a vast noise, and they were gone. Other peoples have sprung up and held their torch high for a time, but it burned out, and they sit in twilight now, or have vanished. The Jew saw them all, beat them all, and is now what he always was, exhibiting no decadence, no infirmities of age, no weakening of his parts, no slowing of his energies, no dulling of his alert and aggressive mind. All things are mortal but the Jew; all other forces pass, but he remains. What is the secret of his immortality?"

I wonder! Perhaps, just perhaps it could be our Torah that is the divine manual that assures that most of the time, if we follow the instructions in the manual, we are working for the Boss of all bosses, and He will make sure that His company never folds.

Yemenite rabbi arrested after raid

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Yemenite rabbi and sect leader Uzi Meshulam was remanded in custody last week after a dawn raid on his fortress home the day before, in which one of his followers was shot and killed by Israeli police.

Some 250 police officers, including members of special crack units, were on hand around the court last Wednesday as hundreds of Rabbi Meshulam's followers tried to follow their leader inside.

The siege of the Meshulam home, located in the development town of Yehud, near Tel Aviv, ended early Wednesday morning when the remaining 26 people who had barricaded themselves inside surrendered. Among them were Rabbi Meshulam's wife, Elisheva, and their children.

Rabbi Meshulam is suspected of 16 different crimes, including attempted murder, shooting in an inhabited area, rebellion, and possession of weapons.

Extended Family

Licensed staff go through extensive training before they are allowed to direct a funeral at Benjamin's. They must first be thoroughly immersed in our ways and the countless acts that distinguish our services. The discipline they learn is that at a highly sensitive time, no detail may be left to take care of itself.

It is remarkable that every senior director who makes arrangements with families has worked with Benjamin's for at least 18 years. After being with us for so long, they are more than knowledgeable, helpful, comforting professionals. They've become like an extension of the Benjamin family. By all competitive standards, this is an impressive and reassuring qualification.

We are proud of all our directors and the way they uphold our traditions. They are Greg Gates, Pam Head, Phil Belanger, Robert Coddington, Paul Weaver, Larry Scheinman, Lisa Cook and Margo Stevenson.

In the old days, family cared for the body until burial. That's still true at Benjamin's today.

Community leaders get the blame for alienating youth

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A former national chair of the Jewish Students' Network has blamed community leaders for alienating young Jews.

Stephen Granovsky was addressing a recent panel discussion on the topic Jewish Continuity: Whose Responsibility Is It?, presented by the Association for Jewish Continuity.

Joining Granovsky at the downtown office of Price Waterhouse was Robert Eli Rubinstein, a former co-chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region's Task Force on Assimilation, Intermarriage and Jewish Identity. Dr. Edmond Lipsitz introduced moderator Nancy Freidberg, a teacher/coordinator at Aish Hatorah.

Granovsky took religious leaders to task for making decisions that impact on Jewish lives without concern for Jewish unity. He cited an Orthodox decree made 10 years ago by the chief rabbis of Israel that states shofar blowing is not allowable in a non-Orthodox setting, a Reform ruling to permit Judaism to survive through patrilineal descent and a Conservative resolution to allow the ordination of female cantors.

"These decisions were made without any meaningful game plan, any meaningful dialogue, and have caused a fire that burns in our community called assimilation and intermarriage," he said.

Granovsky chastized lay organizations for not increasing budgets for young people in spite of six years of discussion and reports about Jewish continuity. "In fact, most have decreased significantly, other than perhaps the federation's decision to fund the campuses, where B'nai Brith has pulled out."

Over the past six years, he continued, leadership or committee representation has not reflected greater participation from young people. Granovsky, who resigned as a member of the national executive of the CJC after three years, said the Jewish establishment is run like a communist government, with no dissent allowed.

But Granovsky has a proposal. In his Jewish community, less money would be sent directly to Israel and more would go toward sending young people to Israel. His vision includes giving synagogues additional funding to recruit more families, funding independent projects to improve the chances of Jewish continuity, and making sure young people make up 10 per cent of all committees.

"In my future Jewish state we encourage schools to join forces and serve the same market instead of tripling our overhead by having four elementary schools do the same thing," he said.

Rubinstein strongly disagreed with Granovsky's contention that responsibility for Jewish continuity lies with community leaders. The lay leadership, he said, are volunteers who do the work out of the goodness of their hearts.

"If you tell them, 'You are not doing your duty, you have a responsibility to ensure Jewish continuity,' they can tell you, 'What do you want from me, all I get out of this job is criticism and aggravation. You think you can do it better, you do it.' "

He stressed there is a tremendous vacuum in Jewish leadership today, with few good people "in any organization, including UJA, the CJC, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. Good people would be welcome with open arms. The trouble is they're not coming forward."

Rubinstein said it is impossible to bring the alienated masses back to Judaism, but he believes the Jewish people will survive and continue.

Audience member Aaron Brotman, the current chair of CJC's task force on Jewish continuity, agreed with Rubinstein's assessment. He said winning the battle against intermarriage and assimilation is difficult. "There are no magic formulas, no easy solutions."

Responding to Granovsky's concern that young people are under-represented in lay organizations, he pointed out that six of the 16 members of the task force on Jewish continuity are young.

Women's dialogue to unite Israelis, Jews, Palestinians

TORONTO — Two Israeli women, one Jewish and one Palestinian, will be speaking together in Toronto on June 12.

Naomi Chazan, Meretz MK, and Mariam Mar'i, founder and president of the Acre Arab Women's Association, are the featured speakers for Sisters and Strangers: A Jewish-Arab Women's Dialogue, the third such speaking tour to be sponsored by the New Israel Fund (NIF).

The Fund, a joint Israeli-North American venture established in 1979, underwrites over 150 Israeli non-profit organizations working to protect civil and human rights, to improve the status of women, to bridge social and economic gaps, to further Jewish-Arab co-existence and to foster pluralism and tolerance.

Chazan and Mar'i "are both committed to overcoming the conflicts, healing the century-old enmities between Arab and Jew, and finding a way to work together," said an NIF news release. "The Sisters and Strangers tour is about hope. It is about celebrating similarities and reconciling differences."

An afternoon lecture at OISE, to be moderated by Michele Landsberg, will focus on women's issues. An evening lecture, followed by a reception, will be held at Temple Sinai. Lawyer Linda Silver-Dranoff is the moderator for the evening, and Ontario premier Bob Rae will introduce the lecture, which will focus on peace, co-existence and women's rights.

Chazan, a former NIF board member, is serving her first term as a Member of Knesset representing the left-wing Meretz party. She is a professor of Political Science and African Studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem where, until recently, she chaired the Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace. She is a former chair of the Israel Women's Network's political committee, and now serves on the Jerusalem Council on the Status of Women.

Mar'i, an NIF board member and Haifa University lecturer has founded several organizations and institutions dedicated to serving women and children and to improving education and social services. In 1975 she became the first Palestinian Israeli woman to earn a BA in Counselling Education and Arts from the University of Haifa. She became the first Palestinian Israeli woman to earn a PhD in 1983, at Michigan State University. Her thesis addressed the role of Arab women in Israel as agents of social change. She is a member of the Prime Minister's Advisory Committee on the Status of Arab Women.

IDF representatives visit as association holds tribute

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Approximately 550 supporters of the Association for Soldiers of Israel (ASI) paid tribute to the fighting men and women of the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) at a black-tie gala dinner recently at the Regal Constellation Hotel.

Participants plunked down $200 each for an ASI project to purchase and renovate a building that will serve as a rest and recreation centre for Israeli soldiers. The building, which will be known as the Beth Goldmintz Centre, is located in Netanya.

Four representatives of the IDF were on hand to participate in the festivities. During their week-long stay in Toronto, the foursome also visited a number of Jewish schools and synagogues to describe their backgrounds and the jobs they perform.

In an interview with The CJN prior to meeting the students at CHAT, Hadas Haviv, a 21-year-old infantry lieutenant, said the recreation centres are known to soldiers as "dodot," the Hebrew word for aunts, because "they take care of you when you are away."

Air force lieutenant Alon Weingarten, 24, said the clubs are especially important for members of his service. Air bases are like giant cities, equipped with recreation centres, libraries, clubs and cinemas that are, in part, funded by the ASI.

IDF volunteers Lior Dahan (left), Hadas Haviv (centre) and Aharon Tevet were in Toronto recently to represent the Israeli armed forces at a banquet sponsored by the Association for the Soldiers of Israel. [Paul Lungen photo]

Recreation area

Clubs and recreation areas are convenient for pilots who are "next to their planes all day. . . They have to defend the airspace of Israel 24 hours a day for 365 days a year, so it helps if you have a nice play to stay," he said.

There are also soldiers who don't have families in Israel and have no place to go on leave or on weekends, he continued. "The ASI provides them with gifts on holidays and takes care of them. They have their own rooms in dormitories. It's a home away from home for them."

Lior Dahan, a 24-year-old navy captain, said the ASI "builds club rooms in most of the bases [that serve] the navy. Sailors after a long cruise go to these clubs to rest."

These centres are located in Haifa, Ashdod and Tel Aviv, he said, and they are equipped with televisions, VCRs, a swimming pool and rest areas.

Aharon Tevet, 23, said as a lieutenant in an infantry field unit, "I don't have a permanent base, so I don't have a club. But the ASI donates TVs and VCRs for us and on holidays you get presents" like books and food.

Hadas recalled an incident last year when visiting an ASI club in Kiryat Shmona, in Israel's north. When an alert was sounded about missiles being fired from Lebanon, we "took the party down to the bomb shelter and we continued dancing there."

Tevet said the IDF provides soldiers with their basic needs, "but the things that make your life better, that's what the ASI provides."

The Toronto branch of the ASI (originally the Association for the Welfare of the Soldiers in Israel) was created in 1969. Since its inception, it has provided funds, winter clothing and gift parcels to Israeli soldiers.

It has also constucted a soldiers' centre and hostel in Beersheva, set up summer camps for widows and orphans of fallen soldiers, established a soldiers' centre in Kiryat Malachi, established a similar centre in Ashdod in partnership with the ASI Montreal branch, upgraded installations on Mount Hermon, refurbished officers' lounges at naval and air bases and provided air conditioners, water coolers, pool tables, lounges and kitchens at other locations.

This year's dinner, held on Jerusalem Day, marked the organization's 25th anniversary. Mickey Baratz served as master of ceremonies, dinner chair was Malka Rosenbaum and brief remarks were delivered by Jack Muskat, chair of the ASI's Toronto branch and Irving Matlow, chair of the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association.

Israel Bonds, Hebrew U Friends to honor Victor

OTTAWA — The Ottawa chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and State of Israel Bonds will honor local Jewish community leader Stephen Victor at a dinner to establish the Stephen and Gail Victor Centre for Trial Advocacy in the Faculty of Law at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The chapter's first major fundraising event in more than 10 years, the dinner will take place at the Chateau Laurier Hotel May 30. Keynote speaker is Thomas Keneally, author of Schindler's List.

Dinner proceeds in part will go towards the academic exchange program between the University of Ottawa and the Hebrew University, first established in 1990.

The Stephen and Gail Victor Centre for Trial Advocacy will help students develop skills in preparing briefs, negotiations, court appearances and conflict resolution, and is available for practising lawyers as well. The centre will be connected with the Samuel Freedman Moot Court Program and the Legal Aid Program.

Stephen Victor was born, raised and educated in Ottawa. He has been practising civil litigation since 1988 and is a senior partner in the law firm Soloway, Wright, Victor. In 1981 he was appointed Queen's Counsel.

He is an officer of the Canadian Jewish Congress, chair of the board of directors of the United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa, a member of the Canada-Israel Committee and the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists and the Carleton County Law Association.

At the dinner, Victor will be presented with the Hebrew University's Scopus Award by university president Prof. Hanoch Gutfreund, as well as the State of Israel Bond's Sanhedrin Award by Alex Grossman, board chair of Canada-Israel Securities.

Interfaith youth forum aimed at breaking down religious barriers

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

BRAMPTON — Name two things about your religion you're proud of. Name two religious leaders you are proud of. Name three things you do out of faith and explain why they are important to you.

Questions in an exam in a comparative religion course?

Hardly. In fact, these three queries were among a series of questions directed at approximately 80 teenagers who participated recently in an interfaith youth forum in Brampton.

The forum brought together young people from the Jewish, Baha'i, Hindu and Christian faiths (from two United Church congregations and one Roman Catholic one) in a bid to break down barriers and acquaint each with the others' cultures. The program, held at St. Paul's United Church, "went beautifully," said Rabbi Larry Lander of Brampton's Har Tikvah Synagogue. "It was really inspiring."

Rabbi Lander, one of the organizers of the event, said the program opened with four prayers of welcome delivered by representatives of each religious group. Estee Buaron sang Oseh Shalom while Brampton North MPP Carman McLelland delivered a Christian prayer.

The program included a Baha'i dance performance whose theme was harmony and unity while each group also played music from their cultures. There was "Christian rock" and a Hindu song of unity. Rabbi Lander said it was especially gratifying for him to see all the group singing a Jewish nigun (melody) at the top of their lungs.

That was followed by a drama/dance performance with an anti-racism theme, put on by a Baha'i group.

But the participants seemed most animated and involved when they were put into smaller groups and were asked to answer questions about their religion and culture, Rabbi Lander said.

"That prompted a lot of talking and they couldn't stop," he said.

The program concluded with a "friendship circle" and the holding of hands as blessings were made over a meal, which included pizza, knishes and somosas (an East Indian deep-fried knish).

Alycia Fridkin, a 15-year-old student at Mayfield Secondary School, said the friendly atmosphere led participants to ask lots of questions about each other's faith. She called the program a very good learning experience as she became aware of cultures she hadn't heard about.

First program a success

Amit Bakshi, a 16-year-old of Hindu background, said that prior to the program he hadn't heard about the Baha'i faith. He said he would recommend to friends that they participate in future programs. "When you have the opportunity to learn about another culture, I say go for it," he said.

Rabbi Lander said the program originated among a group of four members of the Brampton mayor's multifaith committee. In the wake of reported neo-Nazi recruitment in Brampton, the foursome, which included himself, decided to try to bring teens together to learn about each other's cultures.

The first program, held in December 1993, went well and led to the most recent event. Rabbi Lander said the teens were so happy with the latest get-together that they were already talking about holding a barbecue later this summer.

Ottawa Jewish woman confronts horrific past

Sister hanged at camp

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Ottawa Jewish woman stood again at the spot where her sister was hanged in her presence in Auschwitz on Jan. 6, 1945, for stealing gunpowder used to blow up a crematorium at Birkenau.

As a participant in March of the Living, Anna Heilman was flooded with memories as she recounted the horror of the hanging to Jerzy Bebak, a Polish journalist.

Bebak's account was translated into English by Sigmund Sobolewski, a Catholic survivor of Auschwitz, and relayed to Toronto.

Heilman's sister, Ester Wajcblum, was hanged along with Roza Sobata, the leader, Ala Gertner and Regina Safirsztajn, before 30,000 women prisoners, because they smuggled out dynamite so rebellious prisoners could blow up one of the four crematoriums.

"In the summer of 1944, the Russian armies stopped 400 km from Auschwitz, and plans were made for the Polish partisans from the nearby Beskidy mountains to liberate us," Heilman told Bebak.

"This act required a mutiny in the camp to assure a success. With my sister, Ester, I worked in the munition factory Union-Werke near Birkenau, where weapons, hand grenades, and artillery shells were manufactured.

"My sister and three other Jewish girls were locked in a gun-powder room constantly watched by an S.S. guard, as this was a very sensitive area. Nevertheless, these brave girls managed to smuggle out enough dynamite to blow up Crematorium N. IV, during the uprising of the Sonderkommando on Oct. 7, 1944.

"After an intensive investigation, using police informers, the Nazis arrested and tortured the four girls. These heroic Jewish women did not betray any other names, except those of prisoners already killed during the revolt. The last thing I remember was my sister standing on the wooden chair with a rope around her neck, then I fainted."

Bebak wrote that neither the uprising of October 1944, nor the hanging of the four Jewish women — the last one ever carried out at Auschwitz — has been recognized by Polish authorities in the form of a plaque. Although 90 per cent of the victims of Auschwitz were Jews, today in Auschwitz, 90 per cent of the memorial plaques recognize the Polish-Catholic victims, Bebak says.

During preparations for the March of the Living, two former prisoners were playing their instruments in front of the main gate with its ironic sign of "Arbeit Macht Frei." They were the eighty-year-old Fiddler of Auschwitz, Jacques Stromza of Israel and world-renowned clarinet player Giora Feidman. They were members of the prisoners band which played march music to thousands of now dead prisoners leaving for work early each morning and dragging themselves exhausted back in the evenings.

JWF panelists address issues of women's self-image

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A major conflict in the majority of women's lives is the struggle over their body size says an advocate for body image issues.

Carla Rice, chair of the Body Image Working Group at the Toronto Board of Education and founding member of Hersize: A Weight Prejudice Action Group says 90 per cent of women do not like their bodies; 70 per cent are weight preoccupied; 40 per cent are involved in yo-yo dieting and 20 per cent struggle with serious eating problems.

"A shocking 50 per cent of girls in Canada diet before age 9 and many as young as 3 or 4 express dissatisfaction with their bodies," she says.

Rice was part of a recent panel on Women's Image: Beyond the Looking Glass, sponsored by the Jewish Women's Federation social and political action committee. Other panel members included Diane Sacks, pediatrician and director of the Teen Clinic, North York General Hospital, and Paula Caplan, psychologist and author. Moderator was Gaye Lefebvre.

Rice told the capacity crowd at Beth Tzedec Synagogue that the North American woman's quest for thinness is ironic because most cultures see larger bodies as desirable, a sign of wealth and prosperity. "We have learned to despise fat, however, and see it as a lack of will-power. Despite the reality that fatness is not a disease or a sign of moral weakness, many women believe that it is the underlying source of their despair. Thinness is seen as their savior."

Citing more statistics, Sacks said 58 per cent of girls as young as 10 want to be thinner, 12 per cent binge after starving and 54 per cent hide and exercise to lose weight. "No wonder that by the time they are teenagers, 75 per cent perceive themselves as overweight, 35 per cent are terrified of becoming obese and 3 per cent have engaged in vomiting to control their weight."

She said that the pre-teen years are a time when bones grow, and with caloric restrictions there could be a loss of bone growth. "I am terrified of what these girls will be like at age 50 with no calcium in their bones. It is really a health risk."

Sacks said that a majority of kids lose weight because they are striving for perfection and trying to become what they are not. "It would be nice if we could blame the media for our preception of self-esteem but it is not the only source. Our children in large part can blame us. We have to look at ourselves as parents.

"Parents today insist that their kids are perfect. We fool ourselves because we don't appreciate our child's abilities. Few parents understand what their kids can and cannot do, and I think our kids read right through it ... Until we learn to appreciate the individuality of our children, our kids will get the message that we want them to be something they are not."

She said that what parents can do, is get to know their children. "Spend time with them. We need to get to know them so we can tell them in truth that we love them for who they are. They need to know they do not have to be perfect. Let grandparents into their lives because grandparents accept kids as they are. They can listen to them and tell family stories."

Sacks advised parents to throw away their children's Barbie Dolls because of the message they portray about body image, but Caplan said that if kids insist on having Barbies, parents should teach them to think critically. "Associate an obsession with thinness with being ridiculous."

She said that other dangerous images are those of the Jewish American Princess (JAP) and the Jewish mother and noted that many women fear looking too Jewish or not Jewish enough. "Women worry about not doing enough for themselves and then being portrayed as a self-sacrificing Jewish mother or on the other hand doing too much for themselves and looking like a JAP."

Caplan said these negative stereotypes constitute emotional abuse and too few women talk about that form of abuse. "If we don't identify overt emotional abuse then we cannot stop it or the damage it does. The problem with emotional abuse is that women do not have the sense that they are grappling with an issue."

She advised that if the aim of a husband-wife or parent-child confrontation is to silence, shame or intimidate another person rather than to repair the relationship, then that constitutes emotional abuse. "Stereotypes silence us because we are afraid of saying the wrong thing. We have to start having meetings like this one, or nothing will change. What good are the policies of Israel or the United Jewish Appeal if we allow our mothers to be silenced?"

Myths about seniors dispelled

TORONTO — Several years ago an elderly woman resident at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care requested extra privacy so she and her male companion, who visited her frequently, could be physically intimate.

"Staff on the floor were a bit surprised, but after much discussion it was decided this was a reasonable request," said social work director Etta McEwan.

According to Baycrest geriatrician Dr. Michael Gordon, there are still many myths about sexuality and aging.

"We tend to believe that older people don't have sexual urges anymore, or that the elderly couldn't do it even if they wanted to," he said.

"There are those who think older people are so fragile that sexual activity might hurt them, or that older people are physically unattractive and therefore undesirable."

But a number of studies have shown that sex is very much part of people's later years. In one study, researchers asked 800 people over 60 if they still enjoyed sex. Among those aged 60 to 79, 97 per cent said yes, while 93 per cent of those over 80 also said they enjoyed physical intimacy.

In a 1984 study of 3,040 couples age 50 to 93, 87 per cent of men and 25 per cent of women said sex was very or moderately important to them.

The fact that men more than women remain interested in sex isn't that unusual, said Gordon.

"A single older man can usually find a partner, but as women age, they have more trouble," he said. "Women greatly outnumber men by the time they reach age 65, and women may be less willing than men to accept sexual encounters outside the framework of traditional marriage — although this is changing."

Other factors can also have an impact on sexuality in later years. These include health, marital status and personal values about sex which are often affected by cultural and religious beliefs.

Living arrangements are another important consideration, said McEwan. "For older people who are living with adult children or those in long-term care institutions, lack of privacy is a major obstacle to fulfilling normal sexual impulses."

The ability to experience sexual pleasure doesn't change substantially as people age — although if people didn't enjoy sex when they were younger, says Gordon, they probably won't rediscover it in their later years.

But physiological changes like decreased vaginal lubrication in women and impotence in men due to diabetes or certain medication can stand in the way.

Older men with prostate disease may be worried about their potency, or fear sexual activity following a heart attack. Men too may take longer to achieve an erection. Such problems can often be solved and should be openly discussed with your physician and partner, advised Gordon.

It's important not to limit the definition of sexuality to sexual intercourse, says Baycrest social worker Jan Boyd.

"We remain sexual by remaining sensual, by enjoying the stimulation of our senses and emotions, by expressing and receiving the affection of others."

Touching is a basic need, and elderly people can suffer from an absence of touching, especially if they have no partner and few family relationships, or if they have a disfiguring illness which keeps people away.

"Growing older doesn't mean that we stop being human," McEwan said. "Sexuality is an integral part of human experience and that includes the last years of our lives."

Couple celebrates 50th anniversary in Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ardent Zionists Florence and Max Shecter believed there was no more meaningful way to commemorate their 50th anniversary than to celebrate this milestone in their beloved Israel.

Despite many obstacles, including critical health problems, the Shecters fulfilled their dream recently by celebrating their golden anniversary in the City of Gold surrounded by loving family and lifelong friends. The Shecters have three children, Trudy, Debbi and Barry, and two grandchildren, Amanda and Joseph.

The Shecter family members have cumulatively made more than 100 visits to Israel including a trip to celebrate Barry's bar mitzvah. Max says that his children learned to love travel, which led Debbie and Barry to purchase and operate a travel agency in Toronto.

The Shecter simcha was a miracle. Five years ago, Florence developed an infection which affected her heart valves. "She was unconscious for 12 days," recalls Max, "and the family was told three times that she would not make it." Florence had open heart surgery, replacing two valves and repairing a third. Max says, "Thanks to the greatest surgeon, Dr. Tirone David, Florence is alive today."

Max, who suffers from a progressive vision problem and has serious visual impairment, told The CJN that celebrating their 50th anniversary in Israel took on special meaning "because looking back five years, I would never have dreamt this would be possible. We would like to be an example for others to celebrate their simchas in Israel."

Max and Florence (Fox) met on a blind date in 1942. Two years later, on March 5, 1944, while Max was in the Royal Canadian Air Force, they were married. Florence had attended Givens Commercial School and Max had been a student at Harbord Collegiate.

Max and Florence Shecter in 1944 and in 1994 (inset).

Max's parents, Helen and Joseph Shecter were in the furniture business, the owners of Toronto Bedding Co. Max says that his mother had a great influence on him.

"My mother was an entrepreneur in the 1930s," says Max who recalls moving many times and attending more public schools than anyone he knows. His mother was the president of the family business and Max, who worked in the business, took over in 1971 when she died.

Despite her busy work load, his mother contributed her time and money to many charitable ventures. She would often take her son with her. Max followed in his mother's footsteps, especially in her dedication to the Zaglembier Hilfs Farein.

The Shecters have both been active in the community. Florence is a founding member of York chapter of B'nai Brith, she became involved in the Soviet Jewry movement and today she serves as a volunteer in the cardiac unit of Sunnybrook Hospital.

Max, a member of Upper Canada Lodge, held many positions in B'nai Brith and rose to the position of vice president of B'nai Brith International's Supreme Lodge. He is the only Canadian to have served as chair of B'nai Brith's International Council.

Numerous community activities

In 1981, Max entered government service. He was on the Ontario Highway Transport Board until 1989, when he became a refugee judge with the Immigration and Refugee Board, a position he still holds.

Among his other numerous activities in the community, Max was chair of the Central region of the Canadian Zionist Federation and the deputy national president. He was an active member of the national executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress and chair of the national Soviet Jewry committee. As well, he is a past president of the Beth Sholom Synagogue. In 1976, Max received a national Humanitarian Award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

But the pivot of their lives is Israel. Max speaks enthusiastically of their many memorable family trips. In 1976, the Shecters went to Israel with their children to attend a Canadian Zionist Federation national convention. From Israel, they flew to Paris, France to attend a meeting of the World Jewish Congress and then on to Belgium for the second Brussels Conference on Soviet Jewry.

Max recalls their memorable flight from Israel to France where both Golda Meir and Menachem Begin were on board. To his surprise, both Meir and Begin walked together through the airplane shaking hands and talking to passengers.

Looking back, Max says that during "those terrible days five years ago," he remembers speaking to Rabbi Mendel Kirshenblatt who was with the Beth Sholom Synagogue before he retired. "The rabbi, who was optimistic about Florence's recovery, told me that when all the other gates are closed, the gate of tears remains open. He gave us hope and our tears were answered."

Among the 65 guests at the anniversary party held at the Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza in Jerusalem, there were many former Torontonians. Along with speeches from Israeli cousins and friends, the Shecters' children and grandchildren presented a review and tribute to their 50 years together.

Looking back at their tribulations, Max says "this is indeed a highlight in our lives."

Student to lead environmental tour of Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When a Palestinian student leader at York University emptied his pocket change into Beth Lawrence's Jewish National Fund (JNF) pushke two years ago, the incident deepened her belief that environmental issues unify people of all backgrounds.

Lawrence was then a first-year environmental studies student manning a table for a Tu b'Shevat campaign. "What do you care about more, the people who live [in Israel] or the land?" the other student challenged.

"I'm very concerned about the people, but I have to think about the future. It doesn't matter who owns the land if we're all being burnt from the hole in the ozone layer. I would support you if you planted a tree in Libya, Syria or Kuwait," she replied.

Lawrence's concerns for the environment and for Israel will coincide again this summer when she leads an environmental tour to Israel for Bnai Zion, a New-York based fraternal organization which offers a variety of special-interest tours for students.

The three-week tour for 18- to 28-year-olds will run from June 20 to July 11. Its packed agenda includes visits to Ma'agam Michael's nature reserve, the Technion's unit for air pollution research, the Hula nature reserve, solar energy complexes at the Dead Sea, a Negev chemical factory and Eilat's Coral Reserve. A meeting with Israel environment minister Yossi Sarid is also planned. The cost of $2,900 (Canadian) is all-inclusive.

Lawrence's concern for the environment as well as her leadership qualities became evident in her last year at Don Mills Collegiate when she became a founding member and chair of a now-defunct group of local high school students interested in environmental education and activism. The Hope Group was the outgrowth of a one-day environmental conference which Lawrence attended as part of a World Issues course she was taking.

Lawrence, 23, has been to Israel four times since 1988. Two years ago she participated in an environmental tour run by the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. The tour which she will lead this summer was organized at her suggestion, after she met Bnai Zion's Rami Kleinman at last fall's General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Montreal.

Beth Lawrence

The tour will address a wide range of environmental issues, such as water conservation, birds, trees, alternative (ecologically sound) agriculture and desert ecology. "Israel is one of the leaders in the world for alternative agriculture and water irrigation," Lawrence notes.

The environmental aspects of Judaism, such as shmitta (fallow year) and Tu b'Shevat (a New Year for trees), are a source of fascination for Lawrence. She recently organized a national Tu b'Shevat campaign for Network Canada and JNF in which 200 bags of fruit and nuts were sent to Jewish students at universities across Canada. She also organized the recent Earth Week tree planting event for Jewish youth in Toronto on behalf of JNF.

Lawrence is chair of the JNF's university student division, and she has also been involved in other "tree organizations." Following her stay in Israel this summer, she will travel to Kenya for six months as a volunteer for Canadian Physicians for Aid and Relief, planting and taking care of trees in the village of Bongoma.

For further information about the Bnai Zion tour, contact Network Canada, 3535 Bathurst St., Toronto M6A 2C7, telephone 416-783-1165 (toll-free 1-800-467-1807), fax 416-783-1166; or Bnai Zion, 136 East 39th St., New York, N.Y. 10016, tel. 212-725-1211, fax 212-684-6527.

Japanese choir to perform

TORONTO — When Japan's Shinonome Choir performed in concert at Temple Sinai in 1992, an interfaith bond was forged between Jews and Christians, Japanese and Canadians.

Ben Steinberg, the Temple's music director, has been inundated with requests for their return ever since. By a series of coincidences, a repeat performance will take place when the Shinonome Choir sings in both Hebrew and Japanese at 8 p.m. on Saturday, June 4 at Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Avenue.

All proceeds from ticket sales will go to Israel, in keeping with the aim of the Shinonome Choir. Tickets, $8 each, are available in person or by phone from Temple Sinai, (416) 487-4161.

Business grad aids Sick Kids with help of welfare recipients

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto man on welfare recently raised $4,000 for the Hospital for Sick Children.

Stuart Weinstein, 27, spent six weeks asking fellow welfare receipients to sponsor him for the hospital's Miracles in Motion Aerobathon, an all-day aerobics event held April 10. His donation was the third highest.

Standing outside three Toronto-area welfare offices, Weinstein got "down and out types" to donate anywhere from five cents to $1. "You don't have to look hard to find poor people in this city," he said of his strategy.

Weinstein has been on welfare since graduating from the University of Windsor with a master's of business adminstration degree last May.

As the third highest donor, Weinstein was awarded a four-day trip to Las Vegas and athletic equipment. Aerobathon coordinator Hala Bassala assessed their total value at $1,250. Weinstein didn't accept the prizes, instead donating them back to the hospital.

Stuart Weinstein

"I want to get myself into a position where I can afford my own trips," he said.

Reena gala to fete peacekeepers

TORONTO — The Reena Foundation will welcome members of the Canadian peacekeeping force in the former Yugoslavia at this year's gala dinner June 22 at the Inn on the Park Hotel.

The soldiers, who came upon an institution for developmentally handicapped children and adults near the town on Fojnica last winter, provided residents with water, food, clothing and care. The residents had been abandoned by the institution's staff.

Sam Handler, a former board chair of Reena, will receive the Tammy Gutstein Humanitarian Award for his 20 years of dedication to Reena.

Growing rapidly since it opened its first home in 1974, Reena now has more than 200 developmentally handicapped people living in houses or apartments. Reena provides life skills and vocational training for a further 250 people, as well as support for the many hundreds of developmentally handicapped men and women and their families who are on the ever-growing waiting list.

Jewish community not immune to child abuse: halachic expert

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "While there are no statistics available as to how common or how rare the incidence of child abuse is amongst the Jewish community, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that it does exist," said a renowned Israeli medical Halachah expert.

Dr. Avraham Abraham was speaking at Agudath Israel Congregation in North York last week as part of a series of talks on child abuse. Abraham, director of Medicine at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem, said even one single case (of child abuse) can cause an emotional upheaval in our community and must motivate us to put an end to such actions.

"It is inconceivable that we [the Jewish community] have to deal with the notion of child abuse. It can only be explained by the fact that we are part of the degradation of the larger society which is beginning to attack the doors of Jewish homes. How else can we explain a father who molests a daughter or a teacher who emotionally abuses and degrades a student?" he asked.

Sponsored by Chanoch Lanar Institute, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) and the Va'ad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, Abraham was invited to lecture on the medical and halachic aspects of child abuse and the role that parents and educators should take. A professor of medicine at Hebrew University and author of several comprehensive works on medical Halachah, Abraham has discussed the issue with the world's most learned Torah scholars.

"While it is important to stress that child abuse is by no means prevalent within the Orthodox Jewish community, there are special problems associated with reaching out to these parents and helping them to handle such circumstances," says Selma Elzas, Orthodox outreach worker at JF&CS.

"We recognized the need to build a bridge between our agency and the Orthodox community to deal with the halachic issues that arise in dealing with child abuse cases. So in 1992, JF&CS and some members of the Orthodox community, with the support of some Orthodox rabbis, developed a pilot Orthodox Outreach project. This program has now been fully integrated within the agency. "With Dr. Abraham's presentation, it is our hope that we heightened sensitivity to the issue of child abuse and will now begin to work on practical ideas and strategies for parents and educators to follow. Part of this effort includes a brochure that will soon be available through JF&CS called Child Abuse & Neglect: The Responsibility of the Jewish Community."

Abraham pointed out some issues surrounding the question of whether it is in fact ever acceptable to hit a child. The Talmud, he said, calls it a mitzvah to hit a child under certain circumstances, regardless of modern psychology. But one must know how and when it is acceptable.

"When you hit a child to vent your own anger, it only shows weakness and a lack of control," says Abraham. "Hitting a child must not be done as punishment but rather to educate or correct the child when all other means of educating him fail. You must first try reasoning with him, teaching him, opening up a dialogue, cutting down on pocket money. Only as a last resort do you raise a hand. And when you do, you must do it with pity and make sure it hurts you more than it hurts him."

Another contentious issue within the frum community is how to react and who to call if child abuse is suspected. While they are resistant to seek help outside of their own rabbi, the difficulty is that their rabbi is often not professionally trained in the area of child abuse.

The Orthodox Outreach Program has been working with rabbis to ensure that their response is within both legislative and halachic requirements.

"If you suspect a case of child abuse — physical, emotional, mental, sexual, neglect or deprivation — the first thing you must do [according to halachah] is report it to your rav," urged Abraham.

Avraham Friedman of JF&CS added that in Toronto, the Child and Family Services Act of Ontario requires that anyone having reasonable grounds to suspect a child has been or is currently being abused has an obligation to report this information to JF&CS.

Abuse of women seen existing in many forms

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — While the Israeli police have made great strides in their handling of complaints of domestic violence, some judges have been giving offenders light sentences, according to the head of Na'amat Israel's Centre for the Prevention of Family Violence (CPFV).

Some judges in Israel do not understand the dynamics of violence against women in the family, according to the centre's director Ronit Lev Ari, one of Israel's leading criminologists. Representatives of Na'amat have met with judges, she said, and the organization is working towards educating judges of both the secular and rabbinical courts on the subject of domestic violence.

Lev Ari recently spoke on the topic of physical, sexual and psychological violence against women and children, during a Na'amat Canada luncheon at the Sheraton Centre. She was joined by author Paula Caplan, a psychology professor at the Ontario Institute For Studies in Education. CBC news anchor/journalist Maureen Taylor moderated the discussion.

The CPFV's family violence clinics in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Beersheva, which counsel battered wives and battering spouses, receive about 5,000 telephone call a year from abused women representing every sector of Israeli society.

The centre runs a program for young women in the army, trying to make them aware of what a "healthy friendship" is before they marry. "I don't buy the story, 'one day later he became crazy, it was wonderful before,' " Lev Ari said.

Abuse begins in subtle ways early in relationships, she pointed out, when a man attempts to control a woman by telling her how to dress or to stop wearing makeup.

Caplan told the all-female luncheon audience that a quarter of the female population experiences physical abuse, but nearly all women experience psychological abuse. "It can be even more devastating than physical abuse simply because it's harder for you to even prove to someone else that it happened and [that] it is abuse."

Women are likely to blame themselves if they are emotionally abused, Caplan said, by telling themselves they are oversensitive or they provoked the abuse.

She emphasized that psychological abuse is not just the normal give and take of a relationship with a spouse or boss. "When it's clear to you at a gut level that their aim is to overpower or humiliate or shame or silence you," that is psychological abuse, she said.

She listed a number of indicators of emotional abuse in relationships with a spouse, a relative, a boss or a friend.

You are probably in a relationship in which you are being emotionally abused, Caplan said, if you are accumulating an ever-growing list of topics you dare not talk about; if someone makes you feel you need them and they don't need you; if you are called names such as stupid or fatso; if the other person never apologizes for hurting your feelings; if there is physical intimidation that stops short of violence; or if your partner isolates you from others.

A general form of abuse, she noted, is the way people are made to feel stupid and powerless by experts, among them doctors, lawyers, teachers, therapists and salespeople.

Holocaust essay writers' efforts lauded

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporer

TORONTO — One hundred and fifty students from across Ontario submitted essays, poems and short stories to the first-ever writing contest on the Holocaust sponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Thi Lee Tran, winner in the junior (Grades 7-9) division and Chad Skelton, who topped the senior (Grades 10-OAC) division, drew on personal experiences in crafting their award-winning essays.

Tran, a Grade 7 student at Lawrence Heights Middle School in North York, recalled how she was the butt of racist remarks at school, after her family moved to Toronto.

"Just because I was different, they were whispering to their friends, giving me looks and shouting out names that were based on my culture..." she wrote.

"I encourage all people to be brave and speak up against racism," she concluded. "You never know how much you might change their life's circumstances."

Skelton, an OAC student at Bluevale Collegiate Institute in Waterloo, took the visit to Kitchener of Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel and David Irving as the starting point for his essay.

Refute deniers' statements

While he recognizes they are purveyors of lies, he acknowledges he does not have the facts at his fingertips to be able to refute all their statements. That, he said, has prompted him to study the Holocaust more deeply.

"Millions of innocent people died in the Nazi Holocaust," he concludes. "It is up to all members of the human race to remember them. Not only for their own sake, but so that millions more will not perish because we forgot."

Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust education and memorial centre in Toronto, said they were very surprised at the widespread response to the contest and that "the high calibre of the entries was amazing."

Entries came from as far afield as Madoc, Sarnia, Minesing, Fort Erie, Waterloo, Uxbridge and Cobourg, she said.

The contest was geared primarily to non-Jewish children.

David Wichman, also of Bluevale Collegiate in Waterloo, took second place in the senior division with Evelyn Rachel Faulk of City Adult Learning Centre in Toronto finishing third.

Erica Danya Goldblatt, a Grade 7 student at Havergal College in Toronto was named to second place in the junior division and Amos Bitzan, a Grade 8 student at Cummer Valley Middle School in North York was third.

The students' efforts were recognized at an awards ceremony recently at the Lipa Green Building.

Grade 7 student Thi Lee Tran (centre) received the top prize in the junior division of a province-wide writing contest on the Holocaust. She is flanked by her teacher Pamela Tylee and Adam Minsky, chair of the youth for youth sub-committee of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, which sponsored the contest.

Holocaust play puts focus on lives of German youth

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A play about the Holocaust, written by Johnathon Hoskins as part of a youth project at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue about a decade ago, was recently revitalized and staged at the Joseph Workman Theatre on Toronto's Queen Street West.

Entitled Children of the Storm, the two-act drama focuses on four German adolescents — three Jewish, one Christian — during the turbulent Nazi years. The opening scene, in which festivities at a Jewish wedding are disrupted by news that a Jewish shop has been ransacked, is reminiscent of Tzeitl's wedding to Motel Kamzoil which was broken up by a pogrom in Fiddler On The Roof.

Two non-Jewish students, terrorized by members of the Hitler Youth for associating with Jewish friends, find themselves at a moral crossroads. Under duress, one chooses the road toward Nazism by renouncing his Jewish friends. Under equal duress, the other opposes the Nazi bullies, taking the first steps down the road of the Righteous Gentile.

It was refreshing to see the delicacy with which the members of the Young Actors Performance Troupe of Toronto personified pre-war European Jews, with their beards, tallises and old-fashioned garb. They lit Shabbat candles and recited prayers with reverence and respect. Adrian Gorrissen, Russell Underdown and Jennifer Hart stood out in the 23-person cast.

In many ways this production was less than professional, and the script occasionally showed flabbiness and naivete. For instance, could German and Jewish children really have been such close friends in the early 1930s, since anti-Semitic racial theories were increasingly part of German grammar school curriculums from the 1890s?

However, Hoskins and the cast deserve credit for attempting to grapple with these issues and presenting them before the public. In a personal interview, Hoskins told The CJN this production was intended to help develop the script, and he hopes to mount another production next year at the Bathurst Street Theatre, to coincide with Holocaust Education Week. It's well worth the effort.

McMaster student receives travel scholarship to Israel

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A $5,000 travel scholarship has enabled a Jewish student from McMaster University to spend three months studying at the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot this summer.

Sheldon Rowan, an honors molecular biology and bio-technology student entering his fourth year at McMaster, has been awarded the T. Russell Wilkins Memorial

The scholarship was established in 1963 by Mrs. T. Russell Wilkins in memory of her husband. Mrs. Wilkins was the daughter of former chancellor of McMaster University, Howard P. Whidden.

The scholarship is awarded to students "who have attained high standards in their subjects and have demonstrated a lively interest in the humanities and in the human and social implications of scientific development."

At the Weizmann Institute, the 21-year-old student, who hopes for a career in cancer research, says he will be working under Dr. Moshe Oren, a "well known researcher in tumor suppressive genes."

He was excited and looking forward to it, Rowan told The CJN in a telephone interview from his Toronto home prior to leaving for Israel on May 12.

The son of Gerry and Sonia Rowan of Toronto, he attended Associated Hebrew Schools and York Mills Collegiate and spent summers at Young Judea camps. At McMaster he is a member of the McMaster Jewish Students Association.

This is not his first trip to Israel, Rowan said. He was there with his family when he was 12, and later on a youth tour.

He's done "all the major touring," and this time, he remarked, he hopes "to get more of a feel of Israel." He also hopes to have an opportunity to do some hiking and "naturalist tours," and with an extra week in Israel to relax, he may even get to spend some time on a kibbutz.

Aish HaTorah to fete Dans

TORONTO — A live, international satellite broadcast will highlight Aish HaTorah's tribute to Leslie and Judy Dan. The event will be held the evening of May 31 at Beth Avraham Yoseph synagogue in Thornhill.

The Dans have earned a reputation in Toronto for their deep commitment to tzedakah. Among their charitable activities are sending medicine to Third World countries and supporting groups including the University of Toronto, Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, United Jewish Appeal, Netivot HaTorah, and She'arim Hebrew Day School.

Aish HaTorah is particularly close to the Dans' hearts. They have dedicated Aish HaTorah's new World Centre, which directly faces the Western Wall in Jerusalem. They have also dedicated the future permanent home of the organization, slated to be built in Thornhill in the near future.

Satellite broadcast

The evening honoring Judy and Leslie Dan is being coordinated by movie producer and Aish HaTorah Los Angeles student Lou Rudolph, who developed the television mini-series Roots and Rich Man Poor Man.

The satellite broadcast will not only be international, it will be interactive; participants in Toronto will be able to question Aish HaTorah students in Moscow, dance with students at the Western Wall, hear from Hollywood celebrities and sing with Aish supporters in Los Angeles and elsewhere.

Special participants in the broadcast will be Mrs. Oskar Schindler and U.S. President Bill Clinton.

Donations of $180 or more include two tickets to the event and the gala dessert reception which follows. For more information, telephone (416) 636-7530.

BGU offering archeology dig

TORONTO — Ben-Gurion University of the Negev will be offering an archeological field course from June 13 to July 22 under the direction of Zvi Lederman of the university's Department of Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Studies.

Field work will take place at Tel Beth-Shemesh, once an important Canaanite city halfway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Discoveries at the site include the remains of a fortified city from the Judean Monarchy (1000-701 BCE) with one of the earliest known olive oil production centres.

Volunteers will learn archeological field methods and participate in all phases of the excavations. Field work will begin in the early morning, while afternoon workshops will address on-site surveying, recording procedures, pottery reading and computerizing archeological records. Evening lectures will also be included.

Participants will stay in kibbutz housing near the excavation site. Lunch and dinner will be served at the kibbutz dining hall, breakfast on site.

The cost for participation in the full six-week session is $1,300 (U.S.); for a two-week session, $500.

For further information, contact Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University, 1000 Finch Ave. W., Ste. 506, Downsview, Ontario M3J 2E7, telephone 416-665-8054, fax 416-665-8055; or for application forms, write to Zvi Lederman, Archeology Division, Ben-Gurion University, P.O. Box 653, Beersheva 84105, Israel.

Baycrest researcher gets science award

TORONTO — Dr. Endel Tulving, a scientist at the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre, recently received the most distinguished health sciences award in Canada.

He was one of three scientists awarded the annual Izaak Walton Killam Memorial Prizes, which recognize world-class achievement by Canadians in the areas of health sciences, natural sciences and engineering.

Dr. Tulving, who holds the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Chair in Cognitive Neuroscience at the Rotman Research Institute, is a world-renowned experimental psychologist. Over the past 30 years, his work has dominated the psychological exploration of human memory and influenced scientists around the world who study how our brains function.

One of Dr. Tulving's major contributions was to distinguish between two types of memory systems. Semantic memory retains general knowledge and is more likely to be affected by brain disorders, while episodic memory stores personal experiences and is more vulnerable to the effects of normal aging.

Tulving's recent work has shed further light on how memory works. He and a team of scientists from the University of Toronto and the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry have mapped the brain using Positron Emission Tomography (PET) scanning. Observing the behavior of a normal brain, they have been able to prove that different regions are activated when different types of memory are engaged.

Anne Tanenbaum congratulates Dr. Endel Tulving on recently receiving Canada's top science award, the Killam Memorial Prize.

The Killam prizes reward distinguished lifetime achievement and contribution to the advancement of scientific knowledge. The other winners of this year's prizes are University of Toronto scientists Dr. Adrian Brook and Dr. C. Andre T. Salama.

Family well-being linked to issue of Jewish continuity

Non-traditional structures

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Gordon Wolfe

TORONTO — Only by putting aside preconceived notions of what a family should be, and by accepting families however they are defined, will the community be able to focus on Jewish survival, the annual meeting of Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS) heard last week.

Whether single-parent families, remarried families or families headed by gays or lesbians, "we need to identify the strengths and assets of each family we see and not hold out expectations or norms where we value only one kind of family," JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe said to staff, volunteers and clients.

With Jewish continuity high on the community's agenda, Wolfe said JF&CS must understand its role in promoting continuity. For one, the agency must demonstrate how family dynamics and dysfunction affect Jewish identification and thus continuity, he said.

"We need to reinforce that healthy Jewish families are an important dynamic in Jewish identity ... because it is healthy Jewish families which produce healthy Jewish individuals."

But Jewish families, Wolfe added, have undergone tremendous changes: divorce, unemployment, increasing violence and addictive behavior, assimilation and intermarriage, social upheaval — all have contributed to a realigned notion of family.

In their quest to promote Jewish continuity, social workers "need to think about the way in which the community may tend to isolate some Jewish families," while the community itself continues to grapple with whether it wants to support more and more non-traditional family structures.

"Jewish families have always defined themselves and we as a community must accept them as they exist and seek to strengthen them."

If the community continues to expect "traditional" families, blame and "subtle exclusion" threaten to push people away from Judaism, or encourage people to pull away, Wolfe warned.

If JF&CS cannot provide services with Jewish content to clients, one of two things will happen, he said: either families will obtain social services elsewhere, without the Jewish component, or families will do without the services and "perhaps muddle through."

"Either 'solution' has profoundly dangerous consequences for the Jewish community in terms of continuity. I think we need to do more to promote Jewish continuity and feelings of self-worth as a Jew," including the need to talk about Judaism in a way that will bring about a positive connection, Wolfe said.

The annual meeting paid tribute to JF&CS volunteers in direct services and chaplaincy programs.

Marlene Axmith, Archie Rottenberg and Debra Richmond were saluted for their volunteer efforts.

JF&CS president Garry Foster reported that the agency survived the recession relatively unscathed, even though the economic pinch of the last three years has required belt-tightening at a time when services were most needed.

Over the past year, the meeting heard, JF&CS, in association with Senior Care, Mount Sinai Hospital and the Baycrest Centre, established the Jewish Hospice Program, a pioneer service that provides in-home care for dying patients and their families.

As well, the Domestic Violence Program, which serves abused women, hired an additional worker, while the volunteer Multi-Lingual Access Program, which helps those with linguistic and cultural barriers access communal services, was implemented.

In all in 1993, JF&CS served over 3,000 cases, involving some 7,000 individuals; helped more than 2,000 people with direct financial assistance totaling $1.1 million; investigated 234 allegations of child abuse and served 72 children with "in-care" resources.

Completing terms on the JF&CS board of directors are Helen Fischer, Sophie Fischhoff, Ralph Garber, Mendy Maierovitz, Lillian Messinger, Lisa Osak and Joel Reitman.

New board members are Ron Cuperfain, Len Goodman, Val Gorbatyuk, Aviva Heller, Bryna Hyman, Harriet Lampert, Rae Rubin and Leonard Wechsler.

Visit to Israel buoys consultant

TORONTO — Kitty McGilly is rapturous about Israel.

This summer, McGilly will be taking her sixth trip to the Holy Land in the past four years. Her travel history to Israel surpasses that of most North American Jews.

"I think I'm going to apply for citizenship," she jokes.

McGilly is a 58-year-old consultant with the Dufferin-Peel Separate School Board, north-west of Toronto. She specializes in leading Catholic religion teachers and separate school administrators on missions to Israel.

"You can't really understand Christianity until you understand Judaism," she points out.

Her tours trace the origins of both religions, with visits to Jericho, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Capernaum in the Galilee where Jesus established his home base, and Jerusalem's Via Dolorosa, the road to the crucifixion.

McGilly also makes sure mission members see the Western Wall on Shabbat, visit Yad Vashem, and stand where the prophets preached thousands of years ago.

"There's absolutely no time off," she warns prospective participants.

Despite tensions, during her most recent trip after the Baruch Goldstein killings in Hebron, McGilly says the safety of her delegation was never a concern.

Visiting Israel, she believes, not only introduces the country to religious teachers, but rejuvenates their religious spirit.

"We have to give them the opportunity of being turned on again. People come back extremely positive. They say they'll never be the same."

McGilly's two-week trip to Israel this summer will cost each participating educator $2,995, which includes a $400 course fee. The Israel journey counts as a Ministry of Education credit in religious education.

The CHAT Tigers took second place in the second tier of the recent Red Sarachek basketball tournament in New York. The Tigers are flanked by Jonathan Halpert, Yeshiva University Maccabees head coach (far left) and Red Sarachek (second from left). The Tigers consist of (from left) Stu Lapowich, Eric Spindell, Daniel Cantikier, Joel Kruger, Daniel Bar-Dayan, Noah Markus, Arik Bergman, Izzie Greenberg, manager Josh Spodek, coach Jack Pollak and religious advisor Neil Applebaum.

Toronto sends two teams to basketball tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They came, they saw, they didn't conquer, but they had a good time nevertheless.

Two Jewish high school basketball teams from Toronto got to see the Big Apple, meet old friends and combine that with participation at the third annual Red Sarachek Yeshiva High School Invitational, sponsored by Yeshiva University.

Of the two teams, the CHAT Tigers fared a little better on the court, taking second place in the tournament's second tier. The Ohr Chaim Knights were winless in the competition.

In the opening round, CHAT lost to Valley Torah Centre of North Hollywood, Calif., by a score of 39-31 while Ohr Chaim got blown out by Yeshiva of Los Angeles, 91-35. Ouch.

In their next games, CHAT beat the Hebrew Academy of Montreal 41-33 and then Block Yeshiva High School of Olivette, Missouri, 46-40. The Tigers then lost to Cooper Yeshiva High School of Memphis.

Or Chaim, meanwhile, lost to Cooper 58-38 and made it close before succumbing to Montreal, 48-42.

CHAT forward Daniel Bar-Dayan and Or Chaim guard Asaf Prisman were both named to the tournament all-star team.

Though they didn't do well on the court, the boys from Or Chaim enjoyed the tournament, said Norman Smith, principal of Bnei Akiva Schools. "They conducted themselves well and met friends from Bnei Akiva and from Mizrachi camps," Smith said. The boys also toured New York, saw the Yeshiva U campus and participated in religious studies classes, he added.

This was the first time CHAT was accepted to the tournament, said Lil Fox, athletic director at the school. "We've been trying to get into it for a number of years because it's a really good tournament and it's a nice way for the boys to meet other Jewish boys from similar schools in a sports situation."

The tournament, held on Yeshiva U's main campus in Manhattan, is named in honor of Red Sarachek, who coached and was athletic director at the university for 30 years and is a member of the New York City Basketball Hall of Fame.

Members of Or Chaim's team include: Mordechai Applebaum, Jonas Diamond, Hillel Drazin, Gilad Hadasy, Zvi Katzman, Daniel Kleinman, Asaf Prisman, Eitan Prisman, Menachem Roth, Ilan Rubinstein, Robbie Scheininger, Yonatan Wisebrod and David Zigelman. The coach is Jeff Dorfman and Danny Rosenbluth served as chaperone.

Kelman Centre puts emphasis on educating special needs children

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — So how does a man who grew up in Argentina and earned his PhD in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on the subject of Mexican politics, come to be director of projects at the Kelman Centre for Jewish Education at Tel Aviv University?

Dr. David Schers, 61, served in the Argentine army, studied at Tel Aviv University, and married and settled in Israel. He and his wife, a teacher, have two adult children.

On a recent visit to Toronto, Schers told The CJN that he began his academic research by studying and writing about the Jewish community of Latin America. "But then I realized that studying is not enough," he said. "So (I got involved in) beginning Jewish adult education programs in Latin America."

For adults to be good learners, he believes, "they must be conscious of what they do, and be clear about their identity."

Latin America, he said, tries to assimilate everyone, and young people don't feel comfortable about being different. "It is only when they get a feeling of legitimacy about their differences that you can make them interested in Israel."

A Jewish school, he said, including those in Latin America, must be competitive to attract students. To this end, he said, they foster a high level of scholarship, and don't have the patience for the disabled child.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman

Schers said he became interested in what happens to the child with special needs in such a situation.

Which brought him to the Kelman Centre.

The Kelman Centre was named in honor of Rabbi Joseph Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation in North York, who is known for his long interest and involvement in special education in Toronto. He helped found the Reena Foundation and the Kadima Centre for people with developmental disabilities and She'arim Hebrew Day School for children with learning disabilities.

When Tel Aviv University wanted to honor him, Rabbi Kelman, who sat in for part of the interview, noted he had refused to accept the honor unless it was in some way associated with his concern for those with special needs.

To his delight, the Kelman Centre was established.

Its first major project was an international conference on Jewish special education that was held last December at Tel Aviv University.

The proceedings will be published shortly, and another conference, this time dealing with Jewish education generally, is planned for next year.

Schers said that the Kelman Centre "hopes to promote other projects, involving brains, goodwill and means" encouraging an "interaction between Toronto and Israel."

Prof. David Zisenwine, the chair of the new institute, feels that the centre should deal with the urgent problems facing Jewish education, planning, fixing priorities, and researching and developing new programs and projects, especially in special education, but in regular education as well.

Schers feels that the only effective educational approach is to integrate Jewish consciousness, culture (whether religious or not) and social links with other Jews. Only then, he said, will there be both a strong Israel, a strong Diaspora, and a good relationship between the two.

Parents of those with special needs, he said, should become active in the educational process, learning about the problems, getting the help of specialists without becoming too dependent on them.

Cruise to Bombay is truly spectacular

By PHYLLIS KRASILOVSKY
Special to The CJN

The Renaissance VI gladdens the heart with its exotic itineraries.

On the Bombay-to-Singapore run, the journey starts at the impressive Taj Mahal Hotel, opposite the Gate of India.

Passengers are taken on a nautical magic carpet ride along the Indian coast. You pass Goa, unique for its Portuguese history; Cochin, famous for its ancient Jewish synagogue; and Mangolare, home of the Temple of the One Thousand Pillars and a cashew factory filled with 100 beautiful girls shelling nuts.

Then it's on to a guided plantation tour, a boxed lunch eaten in a jungle grove and a visit to Swami Shri Charnkvita Bhatiarstl to hear his anti-violence message.

The Renaissance cruises to Phuket, Thailand's richest resort and long popular for its beaches, hotels and handicrafts. Passengers take a flat-bottomed boat ride through stalactite formations on Phang Nga Bay, scene of some of the James Bond movies, and visit a butterfly farm.

Kuala Lumpur fascinates with its Moorish architecture. Finally, the boat docks at Singapore, land of cut-rate shopping, designer knock-offs, extraordinary food and great historic districts.

The crew of the Renaissance VI are personable. Hugo, the dining room maitre d', wears suits of dazzling hues. Pierre, a bespectacled Parisian, fusses like a kind uncle. And Siebert Christian Malivitz is like the perfect buttoned-down English butler. It comes as a surprise to learn he writes the funny lyrics sung at the crew show.

On such a small ship, the executive staff are equally visible, if more subdued. Cruise director Ann Mitchell is sensitive in dealing with passengers like the 90-year-old woman who insisted on sleeping on deck while waiting for contact with a Martian. Kathrine Haug, a Norwegian stewardess from a large family said, "Here [on ship] I find another, bigger family."

The Renaissance ships are known for their polished mahogany suites with huge windows or terraces, and for their exceptional library and VCR collections.

For a serious luxury-loving cruise passenger, there's no better way to enjoy a Bombay-to-Singapore run than in great quarters tended by "another, bigger family."

Air India flies direct to Bombay from London. Renaissance Cruises: 1800 Eller Dr., Suite 300, POB 350307, Ft. Lauderdale, Fla. 33335-0307 (Tel. 1-800-525-5350)

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

JERUSALEM — At Shemesh, a kosher restaurant along Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall, the waiter loads our table with Middle Eastern delicacies: hummos, tahini, tabouli, Turkish salad, meat wrapped in olive leaves, mounds of pita bread. There's plenty here for the eight of us, but all this is only the prelude to a main course of lamb and chicken shish kebabs.

We are six North American travel journalists, one Israeli tour guide and Yehuda Shen, public relations director for Israel's Ministry of Tourism. Shen, formerly the director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, lived in Toronto for several years, long enough to observe that Canada's largest city is like "New York City run by the Swiss."

"Toronto is such a clean city," he offers, "that every morning before I left my apartment I cleaned my shoes so I wouldn't dirty the streets."

But we've come to discuss Israel, not Canada; Israel, whose first visitors, according to biblical scholars, were Joshua's spies. They reconnoitred the Promised Land and brought back grape clusters so big two people had to carry them. But Shen suggests that the first Foreign Individual Tourists (a travel industry colloquialism) came much earlier. "Abraham was the first. He did a beautiful FIT business with the angels in his tent."

Mount Scopus

Shen was born at Hadassah Hospital on Mount Scopus in 1947, one of the last Jewish babies born there before that particular area of East Jerusalem was split off in 1948. After the War of Independence the Egged Bus Company retired its Number 9 Bus Line, which had served Mount Scopus. Nineteen years later came the 1967 Six Day War and the reunification of Jerusalem. Egged, which had kept its Number 9 line in reserve all those years, dutifully resumed service to Mount Scopus.

That kind of simple loyalty and faith in the future is what Shen and others in the tourism ministry are hoping to see from North American travellers. "I'll tell you one thing: when it comes to panic, the Americans do it faster than the Europeans. After the Achille Lauro [cruise ship hijacking] incident, in one week there were 17,000 overseas cancellations."

Although unable to supply precise figures, Shen concedes tourism has dropped following the recent fatalities in Hebron, Afula and Hadera. "If there has been a drop, it's more in the Jewish market." Some Jewish travellers, he says, are quicker than anyone to cancel travel plans to Israel, sometimes at the first glimpse of a negative headline.

"The Christians come here to make a pilgrimage but the Jews prefer to go instead to the holy city of Fort Lauderdale," he says. "I'd like to tell them, 'Stop opening your wallets and turning your backs. We need you to visit Israel.' "

Hebrew University

After lunch we tour Ben Yehuda's colourful melange of Judaica shops, cafes, restaurants, galleries and gift shops where one can buy anything from an inexpensive American-style T-shirt to an ancient Jewish coin worth $10,000 (US). After a stroll down its neat flagstone length (from which cars are banned), we pile into the van for a visit to Mount Scopus. Our guide, Amnon Cohen, drives along the former Green Line that once divided Jerusalem, pointing out buildings where shrapnel damage from the 1967 war is still visible.

At a lookout near Hadassah Hospital and the campus of Hebrew University, we survey the sprawling, windswept City of David. Jerusalem extends to the horizon, a city of cream limestone, most pleasing to the eye. (The architectural uniformity was one of few benefits to arise from the British Mandate.) Amnon points out the ancient walls, towers and domes of the Old City, discussing each in turn. Here is Mount Zion, there the Mount of Olives, a Jewish burial ground since ancient times.

As it is Shabbat, we return early to the hotel. Later, with about an hour of sunlight left, we stroll through the Old City, through the marketplace still crowded with tourists, past Arab merchants hawking souvenirs, to the Kotel — the western and only surviving wall of the Second Temple, the holiest site of the Jewish people. On this day, the ancient monolithic stones receive a cacophony of wails and prayers from diverse congregations: yeshiva bochers, Chassidim in black garb, Sephardim, Ashkenazim, Americans in blue jeans, men and women separated by the mechitzah, their voices mingling in the sweet twilight above the thronging plaza.

Between Mincha and Ma'ariv, afternoon and evening prayers, a stranger hit me on the chest, over the heart, and uttered "Chazak!" (Strength!) as he passed. Later, during the walk back to the hotel through the picturesque Armenian quarter under a dark sky, I felt a strange momentary sensation — as though my right hand had been about to fall loose, but instead had been fully restored to health.

Tabernacle choir a feast for the ears

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

SALT LAKE CITY — Beneath the giant dome of the Mormon Tabernacle, the harmonious voices of the famous Mormon Tabernacle Choir rise into the air, melding sweetly. Whether it's a biblical hymn or a medley from The Music Man, each selection sung by the 330-member choir reverberates with a rare purity in this hallowed hall.

Established in 1847, the Mormon Tabernacle Choir is one of the oldest performing choirs in the world. Ever since its first appearance outside Utah, at the Chicago World's Fair of 1893, it has received critical acclaim and recognition as one of the foremost choral organizations anywhere. As usual, most of the pew-like benches in the large Tabernacle are filled for this Thursday evening rehearsal.

Many audience members are visitors to Salt Lake, who are familiar with the choir through its weekly radio broadcasts, which have aired since 1929 (on the CBS network since 1932). The choir is a staple of the U.S. Bible belt.

At present, the weekly half-hour Sunday morning broadcasts are carried live by more than 50 television and 100 radio stations in the United States. Hundreds of other stations play a taped version. As well, these voices are carried via shortwave radio to living rooms in Russia, Scandinavia and other countries. In recent years, the choir has performed in many countries, including Canada, Japan, Korea, Australia, Brazil, Russia — and Israel.

"Our visit to Israel (for two weeks in 1993) was one of the most fantastic experiences we've ever had," said Don Ripplinger, associate director of the Choir. "We've never had audiences that were more knowledgeable and more appreciative than these people were."

In Israel, the choir performed the Berlioz Requiem with the Jerusalem Symphony, which Ripplinger called "probably the most difficult work the choir has ever done." Written by French composer Hector Berlioz in 1837, the Requiem is an overwhelming work for large orchestra that includes 110 violins, an augmented brass section, 16 timpani, and more than 200 voices.

Diverse range of musical themes

An album of material that the choir performed with the Jerusalem Symphony (excluding Berlioz) will be released on compact disc this spring, Ripplinger said. The recording is one of many albums that the choir has released, reflecting a diverse range of musical themes including spiritual hymns, folk songs, show tunes and Christmas carols.

A breakaway Christian sect founded in 19th-century America and centred in Utah, the Mormons seem to cherish their links with the Jewish people. According to church spokesman Thomas Daniels, church tradition holds that the Mormons are descended from the Hebrew patriarch Jacob, mostly through Joseph's son Ephraim. A series of large paintings in one of the visitor centres depicts scenes from the Hebrew Bible, such as Noah's Preaching Scorned and Abraham On The Plain of Mamre.

MAKEOVER: Image consultant is called 'the soul of discretion'

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

In a ritzy Toronto hotel restaurant, image consultant Gladys Eskenazi looks me over with her piercing brown eyes.

"You should never wear white," she pronounces, shaking her head of brown curls.

I am dismayed. It is my brand new white shirt, the crisp white shirt I though every modern woman was supposed to have in her wardrobe. But Gladys is firm. "No. You cannot wear white because it makes your freckles stand out and you look all spotty."

Gladys, 55, doesn't stop there. The Uruguayan-born dynamo spends the next 11 days arranging for me to have my skin examined, my toes pedicured, hair color changed, eyebrows plucked into submission and hairstyle updated, all the while picking out clothes she feels will flatter my figure and suit my personality.

She also fields calls (781-9461) from the 20 or so clients who already use her services. They ask her advice on everything from party dresses to where to buy their lingerie.

For the most part her clients are Jewish women, many of them Orthodox, who have heard about her from friends: Gladys and her team — esthetician, makeup artist, hair colorist, hair stylist — do not advertise. Together they charge $1,000 and up for a thorough, two-hour consultation, and they are souls of discretion. . .and honesty.

"This is for your enemy," Gladys will tell a client while sorting through her closet. A fashion designer with her own atelier for the past 24 years, Gladys' trained eye is quick to spot fashion disasters. She is also unthreatening, funny and respects the restrictions of an Orthodox wardrobe.

"Everyone needs some help," she says in her musical Spanish accent. "People think it's idiotic to have someone tell them what to wear until they try it." To pull the look together, she takes them shopping. Said one client to me: "I always thought I was well-dressed. . .until I met Gladys."

I have no such illusions about my appearance: six years of university have reduced me to wearing ripped jeans and bags under my eyes. Gladys quickly hands me over to esthetician Sylvia Kohn (487-4731) for a facial. Her capable hands restore color to my cheeks.

Then it is over to Michelle Patterson, Frank Cerni and Mandy Clark for, respectively, hair color, style and makeup. The three work together at an upscale Toronto salon.

On this night they have rented a hotel room for the makeover, but they usually bring their portable salon to the client's home — Michelle with her own towels and garbage bags to protect against hair chemicals. There is no mess.

Michelle fingers my brown hair and decides it needs more "oomph." Sixty minutes later it is a rich mocha auburn with red highlights (in-home color starts at $50 for a semi-permanent). "What your natural color is and what you should have can be night and day," she assures me. The subtle red streaks catch the light.

Frank wants to cut my newly "oomphed" hair super short. I balk. We compromise on a swingy cut that Frank says I can make look good at home (in-home cut and style for wigs and hair are $200). Mandy applies makeup for day and evening, all the while explaining her choice of colors (the same at home is $120 to $150, with occasion makeup $75 to $120).

Gladys takes charge again for the below-the-neck transformation. She herself wears jeans and a bare face ("I could care less how I look," she sniffs). She tells clients to avoid impulse shopping as well as clothes that draw attention away from the woman wearing them. "If I see a beautiful dress and don't see the woman's face, what's the point?"

To draw the right kind of attention, Gladys has chosen for me a tailored Armani pantsuit in sage and cream because it is "soft, casual and free." Her eyes gleam as she later wraps a silver leather Donna Karan miniskirt around my 5'9" frame. "I chose it because you're crazy inside and weird and want to have fun!"

Five hours later, the team packs up carrying cases and zips the borrowed clothes back into garment bags. I walk out onto Bloor Street, exhausted but exhilarated. Can't wait to get home and throw out that white shirt.

Weekender offers home shopping

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Home shopping is the way of the future, according to Lia Keeping, vice-president of sales for Weekender Ladies Wear, a company that has more than 3,000 fashion coordinators making home presentations to groups of customers across Canada.

With women busier than ever, Keeping said, shopping at home is a chance to socialize and to buy clothes. Service, she added, is another benefit of home shopping. "It is really nice to go shopping and have a salesperson's attention for as long as you want it."

Weekender, a Canadian company whose head office is located in Thornhill, started out in 1984 with a basic collection of seven pieces that could be mixed and matched to create 21 outfits. Since then, the basic line has been expanded with the addition of new collections that come out twice yearly — for spring/summer and fall/winter. "This has given us many more combinations, from casual sportswear to office wear, and with accessorizing, it can be worn in the evening too," said Keeping.

Oakville area fashion coordinator Gloria Kidston shows her customers of all ages — from 18 to seniors — how to mix and match the fashion collection of classically designed polyester/cotton skirts, pants, tops and jackets to create a variety of Weekender looks, and how to mix and match the pieces with their current wardrobes.

For casual wear, the oversized shirt tail jacket ($69, available in red, navy, white, black, willow, cornflower, tea rose and sage) can be worn with leggings, she said. With a full skirt instead of leggings, the outfit is perfect for the office. The fashion vest ($45, in white, black, tea rose and sage) can be worn with the skirt ($29, in red, navy, white, black, willow, sage, cornflower dot, tea rose dot), but in combination with the tailored jacket ($69, in the same colors as the shirt tail jacket) and dress shoes, Kidston says the look is acceptable for most office environments.

Although current fashion trends are reflected in the Weekender collection — neutrals are big in their spring fashion collection, for example — they are essentially classics that can be worn for several seasons. Kidston, who has been wearing some of her Weekender pieces for up to eight seasons, says her customers want clothing that lasts. In fact, the company guarantees each piece for six months. If a seam goes or if the garment is not up to the customer's standards, it will be replaced.

The collection comes in a full range of sizes, from extra small to extra large. Made of a 50/50 blend of polyester and cotton, the garments are machine washable and should be hung to dry.

Weekender is able to offer its collection at reasonable prices because the pieces, created by three in-house designers, are timeless, and because the fashion coordinator does not have rent and other overhead to pay, said Lia Keeping.

Keeping, who started out as a fashion coordinator nine years ago to make extra money, said selling for Weekender, which requires an initial investment of $1,000, is a great opportunity for women to start their own business without any of the risks involved. "Women of all different backgrounds and ages are becoming successful. Most coordinators work full or part-time at another job. They don't have to give up a job to become a coordinator."

Weekender had sales revenues of a million dollars after the first year in business, and revenues doubled every year until 1989, reported Keeping. The company expanded to the United States six years ago, opening an office in Chicago, and branched out to the United Kingdom three years ago, where they are based 70 miles outside of London, England. She is proud that Weekender, a Canadian company, has achieved success outside of Canada.

For an at-home presentation — ideally for groups of six — or information about becoming a fashion coordinator, call (905) 886-5990.

Summer makeup should be soft

By CAROL WISE
Special to the CJN

Summer, is definitely the most rejuvenating time of the year. The abundance of sunshine and warmth seems to give us an exhilarating sense of well-being.

Summer makeup will be soft and subtle. It is the time of year to simply enhance your best features and detract from your less attractive ones. Less is more is your best motto, as the heat and humidity can cause heavily applied make-up to become streaked and matted.

Foundation will be one of your most important summer choices. It should be light in texture, but still give you good coverage. Match the color to your natural skin tone, perhaps two shades darker, but no more as it is most unattractive to have a dark face with a white neck. Most foundations have an S.P.F. factor already in them; this will save you time. It is imperative to wear sun protection at all times. Apply your foundation sparingly — first blend a few dots on your fingers, then blend onto your face starting with the sides and finishing with your nose, chin and forehead. Make sure you even out all your skin tones.

Brush on your blush high on your cheekbones. Be sure to use a soft brush to avoid irritating your capillaries. Dust your whole face with a bronzing powder to give you that healthy glow of summer.

The most popular shades of eye shadow will be sand, butter, mocha and chocoate. Light shades should be applied under the brow and on your eyelid. Apply darker shades in the crease of your eye. This technique will contour your eyes and make them appear larger.

Eyebrows should be plucked and well shaped. Use a brow pencil in the same color as your natural brows. Lift and extend but always keep them as natural looking as possible.

The lip pencil will be your best friend this summer. Choose a color that is most flattering to your skin tone. Pencil your entire lip and then add a similar color of lipstick. The warm weather can cause your lipstick to smudge and this method will help to avoid this problem.

Your creams for the summer months should be lighter in texture. Of course, this depends on your skin type. If you have dry skin, continue to use your richly formulated winter creams. However, if you have normal or oily skin, choose a moisturizer that has a lotion consistency.

Your cleansing regime is imperative at this time of the year. The warm temperatures combined with humidity can cause clogged pores and probably some unwanted blemishes. Cleanse your skin thoroughly and be sure to follow with a skin refresher that suits your skin type.

Follow these helpful hints, add your best smile and have a great summer.

Ooh-la-la the latest in Body Body Wear

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

You don't have to have the body of a $4,000-a-day menswear mannequin to carry off the clothes created by Canadian company Body Body Wear.

Sure, any one of the 70 styles produced by this Toronto-based design house looks great on someone like Tony, a photo model for Giorgio Armani and Hugo Boss.

But not many men can lace themselves into a second-skin football short short (retail price $39.95) without looking ridiculous.

Stephen Sandler, the 31-year-old chief designer and president of Body Body Wear, knows this. That's why the Body Body Wear line also includes street clothes, club wear and loose-fitting athletic wear for the body unconscious.

Sandler, whose clothes are produced in his Toronto factory by 12 sewers, introduced the Body Body Wear last May at a menswear trade show in Las Vegas. Since then the line has taken off.

"We can't keep it in stock," Sandler said from his Wellington Street office. "It shocks me how people really love the clothes."

Among the items that men love are loose-fitting shorts in ribbed 100 per cent cotton. The shorts, with elastic waist and two pockets, come in black, white, grey and navy and retail for $35. A pant-length version is currently in production. Matching tank tops and T-shirts run between $19.95 and $24.95.

Most of the material Sandler uses comes from Canada. He is especially pleased with a custom cotton-lycra blend, which he transforms into figure-hugging biking shorts ($29.95), bodysuits ($49.95), zippered vests ($49.95) and muscle t-shirts ($34.95) in 12 colors.

The line is expanding this season to include tartan vests and kilts — yes, kilts — in polyester-viscose, and new bathing suit styles in nylon-lycra. Sandler is also experimenting with sheer and mesh fabrics for summer.

Sandler is not a designer by training. His first business was a line of foodstuffs he developed in 1982, after high school. "The mustard business is tougher than the clothing industry," he observed.

Sandler sketches the designs for Body Body Wear but relies on pattern maker Eudoro Mero to make them workable.

However, Sandler works 13-hour days filling orders and promoting the line. He says he fields 30 calls a week from interested retailers, and is considering increasing the production runs of 300 units per style to meet demand.

But Body Body Wear is not just for men. Women are increasingly drawn to the bold colors and quality construction of the athletic clothes. Sandler says 80 per cent of the line can be worn by women, with the exception of the low-cut tanks and bodysuits.

Body Body Wear is sold in 100 stores in places as diverse as Barcelona, Bonn, Chicago, Hong Kong, London, Paris and Sao Paolo.

In Canada, the line is carried at the Bay in Vancouver, Calgary and Toronto, and in company-owned retail stores in Toronto and Montreal. Mail order catalogues can be ordered by sending a self-addressed stamped envelope to Body Body Wear, PO Box 460, Station P, Toronto, Ont., M5S 2S9.

Elegant plus-size fashions

Leona, Marla and Steven Lewis of Big Time Fashion Resale, not only know how to make larger women look and feel good, they also know how to keep clothing budgets down.

The mother, daughter and son team, in business for about three years, specialize in selling consignment clothing for women size 16 and over. "Before we opened our store, Marla and I found from experience that one had to be very lucky to find specialty clothing in a consignment shop. If the shops carried items to size 14 we were lucky. We knew that this would be the niche to fill in our business," says Leona Lewis.

Leona, Marla and Steven Lewis of Big Time Fashion Resale.

She says that their philosophy is to give larger women exactly what they want — quality clothes at lower prices. "When a women comes into our store, we want them to feel and look good. As well as listening to what they have to say, we encourage them to experiment with different colors and styles. The myth that larger women should stick to dark colors is gone. Everyone looks attractive in brights and pastels."

Stock at Big Time Fashion Resale is plentiful, with everything from casual to formal wear, as well as accessories such as shoes, bags and jewelry. New stirrup pants, made especially for the fuller figure, come in a multitude of colors from black, copper and mushroom to green and red, and coordinate well with the blazers, tops and sweaters always in stock. "The manufacturer of these pants did research in order to fit the fuller figure properly. A good fit takes more than merely making a small size bigger," says Lewis.

Also in the store is a line of new lycra fitnesswear including tights, leotards and body suits that can be mixed and matched.

"As well, we've begun taking bridal gowns in size 14 and up on consignment. We can have the gowns, which cost half of the original price, altered, and can also outfit the bride with a matching veil and shoes. We take whatever brides bring in," says Lewis.

Men are not forgotten at Big Time Fashion Resale and Steven carries mens wear in all sizes including suits, blazers, sports jackets and blue jeans. "The men enjoy the store and we've found that women are not at all hesitant about shopping with men," she says.

She stresses that when women walk into their store they are immediately made to feel comfortable. "We affirm that we want women of size to look the best they possibly can. This is who they are, and this is their body. We respect them for that and do not hesitate to say if an item is not flattering. We do a lot more than just sell clothes."

Mr. Leonard for '94

Loose layers. Cool, natural fabrics. Compelling organic hues, from mild — neutral, cream, and coffee — to spicy — paprika, curry, and sage. This is the fashion mood for Spring/Summer.

Mister Leonard, Canada's premiere manufacturer of fine women's fashions, has captured this spirited new attitude with its collection of Spring fashions. All garments emphasize adaptability, choice, balance and individual expression.

"Our on-going consumer research and in-depth discussions with retailers tell us that Canadian women want fashion flexibility, reality and affordability," says Lorne Gertner, president of Mister Leonard.

"They intend to build on their existing wardrobes by adding some of the season's most up-to-the-minute new trends. That's why options play such an important role in our new collections."

For this season, Mister Leonard is proposing endless options in three distinct fashion collections. They include the versatile Leonard Studio, which bridges 9-to-5 and 5-to-9 with stylish essentials; Mister Leonard Collection, with its trend-oriented approach to classic career wear; and Leonard Sport, featuring free and easy casual wear. Each selection highlights Mister Leonard's unique Fashion Advantage — nine easy pieces that create 20 looks for under $1,000.

Leonard Studio presents artfully coordinated separates — understated blouses, vests, jackets and skirts in raw linen, crisp cotton and silk noile, with delightful embroidery and beading detail. Leonard Studio is designed in three tantalizing groupings: Perfectly Natural is raw, yet refined; Moroccan Spice is a hot selection in rich shades of curry and paprika; and Spring Elements pairs classic navy and cream.

Thanks to the Mister Leonard Collection of careerwear, you'll almost look forward to Mondays. This selection features flattering, feminine, fitted jackets and vests; sheer, shapely blouses; classic pants; and suit-length and ankle-sweeping skirts.

Also in three groupings, Mister Leonard Collection offers: Exclusive Engagement, featuring deep navy paired with delicious shades of beige and sky blue; Collectible Classics, impeccably faultless in black with honey yellow and ivory; and City Gypsy, enchanting in energetic coral and black.

Leonard Sport combines casual comfort with fabulous fashion — from pleated skirts and crochet toppers, to french terry co-ordinates and denim dependables. It comes in two groupings: Sand Dunes which is naturally-appealing in refreshing tones of cactus, wheat and sand; and Ports of Call which sails into spring with navy, red and white stripes.

From dressed-to-impress to easy casuals, Mister Leonard's three versatile fashion collections — Studio, Collection and Sport — deliver wardrobe classics and style essentials for 1994.

SEHM:

Soft and simple

Simple and soft are the two watchwords for summer '94 men's fashion.

A fashion which softens the shoulder line, favors comfort and gives full power to flowing, light fabrics in basic colors. This season's big hit: the waistcoat in knitted, plain or printed fabric to be worn with jackets so unstructured they sometimes look like long shirts. Colors: the neutrals, blues and sun-drenched spicy tones take the lead. Fabrics: make way for linen in all its forms, cotton and more technical fabrics.

Silhouettes

Spotlight on three-button jackets.

With suits, jackets button up higher than usual. On their own, jackets are completely unstructured and take inspiration from workwear or are worn as long shirts.

Trousers are more tapered or '50s drainpipe style.

The sportswear world welcomes back the blouson which barely covers the waist.

Still very much in favor is the yachting style with reefer jackets and parkas with metallic clips similar to those found on firemen's jackets.

Among the latest hits: the waistcoat and city shirts with small soft collars or long and loose shirts and a strong comeback of the short-sleeved shirt.

Knits: polo-shirts with details in fancy fabric, long T-shirts with loud designs, wide horizontal rugby-style stripes or very fine vertical stripes.

Graffiti-style

Fabrics

Some coolwool in false plains at the start of the season.

Lots of linen in its pure state or mixed.

Smooth or embossed seersucker-style cotton with madras, gingham or window checks.

Of paramount importance: all the crumpled, worn looks for linen and cotton.

Still a lot of viscose mixed with noble fabrics to give softness.

Strong fabrics: tarpaulin, canvas and twill, often waxed to offer protection against sea spray or showers and denim in all its forms.

Colors

A range of spicy colors (yellow greens, oranges).

For the juniors in mid-summer: explosive mixture of basic colors, whitened or not, and of prints: checks, stripes, tie-dye.

FOUR MAIN THEMES

A Story Of Balance

Simple and fluid: fashion has a relaxed look and plays on the layering of clothes: unstructured jackets, long shirts worn with a waistcoat, the number one item this season.

Fabrics — distressed, crumpled, ultra-light or heavy in a viscose quality, plain, with checks or fine pyjama stripes.

A few tropical notes: Nehru collars, trousers with a draw-string waist, Indian trousers draped up to the ankle for the most fashion-oriented models.

The whole range of neutrals — pure white, off-white, sand and earth — to contrast with black.

A Story Of Spices

Mixing the city and sportsville look in a color range inspired by spices — pepper greens and reds, paprika, saffron and curry for suits and unstructured jackets and blousons. Very little total look but a desire to go for monochromes.

Waistcoats are still very much in favor.

A Story Of Blues

A rustic look for an authentic fashion in a very wide range of blues to be combined.

Workwear-inspired shapes.

Checks of all sizes and rustic-style fabrics: dishcloth fabric, twill, suedette and mostly stone-washed jeans.

Still lots of knitted or leather waistcoats in plain or stripped ticking fabrics.

Shirts with rolled-up or short sleeves.

A Story Of Mixes

A graffiti-style fashion which combines explosive mixtures of both colors and prints (stripes with checks or tie-dye prints).

Small items which constitute the basic wardrobe for juniors: sleeveless denim waistcoats to be worn over a loose T-shirt with gigantic prints, baggy overalls, tight or slightly flared jeans, boxer or cycling shorts.

These trends have been defined in consultation with comite de mode masculine modom (the modom men's fashion committee) and fashion designers.

Concert captures composers' hits

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The concluding concert of this season's Holy Blossom Our Musical Heritage series was eclectic to say the least.

The first half was devoted to hit tunes of Jewish Composers on Broadway, while the second showcased a synthesized rock Friday night service by American composer Gershon Kingsley called Shabbat For Today.

The musical marriage is, however, not incompatible because there are throughlines linking the two halves together. Kingsley is an Emmy award winning composer of pop music for TV and film and is, therefore, kissing cousin to composers of show tunes. As well, both halves of the program were graced by the artistry of tenor Mark Dubois who functioned as soloist in Shabbat For Today and performed with mezzo-soprano Gisele Fredette in the Broadway section.

This writer has always admired Dubois on opera and operetta stages and was therefore delighted to experience this more casual side of his repertoire. Because he is known as a wonderful interpreter of music, it is not surprising that Dubois can really "sell a song;" he instinctively understands how to bring to life the music of Rodgers and Hammerstein and Sondheim, for example, without being obviously showy. The tenor is able to transcend the formality of his operatic training to easily phrase his voice for the more relaxed style dictated by the Broadway genre. Many opera singers sound stiff performing popular songs but not Dubois; no wonder he is a mainstay at so many symphony pops concerts.

Approach one of caution

Fredette, on the other hand, did not find the transition to Broadway as easy as did her colleague and, although she has an admirable mezzo-soprano voice, she often seemed to be reining in her vocal power to make her instrument fit the lighter singing mode. Her approach was one of caution rather than of giving in to the music. Although she performed well in such numbers as Jerome Kern's Can't Help Lovin' That Man O'Mine from Showboat, this writer would have liked the singer to give vent to the passions in the Broadway genre that she has ably projected on opera stages.

The singers were complemented by the estimable pianist and arranger Brian Finley. Finley is one of those rare accompanists who is not afraid to use the piano to accent dramatic moments and create a dialogue with the singer. His piano playing is gutsy and passionate, and he worked particularly well with Dubois in creating musical mood and ambiance.

Holy Blossom's cantor Benjamin Maissner joined the couple for some duets and trios, adding local color to the proceedings.

The women of the choir, who had the greater musical part to play in the service, acquitted themselves very well with an elegance of sound; the men, however, were disappointingly ragged and uneven in their singing. Dubois negotiated the Hebrew/English mix of lyrics with aplomb and threw his voice right into the upbeat rhythmic pattern of the rock genre; in ballad numbers like Eitz Chayim, the singer was particularly effective. He even took over conducting duties to allow Maissner to render a "faster than the eye can blink" Hebrew solo. The two also performed the haunting duet Yih'yu L'ratzon beautifully together.

Walter Soles, narrator of Shabbat For Today, is always a reliable performer and did what he could with the arcane, preachy and pretentious narration which really added very little to the music except intrusion.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

Jewish Cooking in America by Joan Nathan (Random House $40.00)

This unusually handsome volume, replete with more than 100 photographs and illustrations, contains over 300 kosher recipes — old and new — as well as a cornucopia of stories and information about Jewish food.

The recipes come from both Sephardi and Ashkenazi sources and include the history behind such favorites prepared in advance of the Sabbath as cholent (long-cooked rich meat stew) and kugel (vegetable and noodle puddings). I was surprised to learn that potato latkes are served with maple syrup in Vermont and goat cheese in California, and that gefilte fish is made with white fish in the midwest, salmon in the northwest, haddock in New England and shad in Maryland.

The famous ice cream concern, Haagen-Dazs was started by a Polish immigrant to the United States who was determined to give his product a foreign sounding name. The only country which saved Jews during World War II, he decided, was Denmark, so he put together a totally fictitious Danish name which doesn't mean anything.

One of the most important prepared products for the Jewish housewife was the invention of Crisco in 1910. In marketing this product, a totally vegetable shortening, Proctor and Gamble advertised that it was a product "for which the Hebrew race has been waiting four thousand years."

Hot dog stand

In 1916, Ida and Nathan Handwerker founded Nathan's Famous, a Coney Island hot dog stand that grew into a chain of more than 50 establishments. Mrs. Handwerker boasted that Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt served the hot dogs to King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. Nelson Rockefeller once remarked, "No one can hope to be elected to public office in New York without having his picture taken eating a hot dog at Nathan's."

Hebrew National, had the task of making kosher hot dogs popular with the general public. They came up with the advertising slogan, "We answer to a higher authority," which implied that the product was cleaner and more carefully prepared. Today, only 20 per cent of the company's clientele is Jewish.

Starting with President Franklin Roosevelt, kosher meals have been served at the White House when desired. On one occasion the entire White House kitchen had to be rendered kosher at the last minute. A Jewish woman cook at the White House recalls that "the mashgiachs came with blow torches as big as they were. They spent all day burning and covering surfaces with aluminum foil. I felt it was a historical moment and at the same time it was comical."

Famous deli

One of the most famous of New York restaurants is the Carnegie Delicatessen with its multiple gastronomic delights. When Bob Simon, the CBS reporter, was held captive during the Gulf War he asked for one thing upon his release, "I want a Carnegie Deli corned beef sandwich with a pickle." And the Carnegie Deli, never missing a beat, sent one to him on the next airplane.

Coca-Cola was one of the earliest products in the United States to be declared kosher, having been tested in 1931. There was some disagreement, however, but by 1935, it was made kosher during the year and for Passover and has been so ever since.

The author tells a story of a Bar Mitzvah reception where a life sized sculpture of the lad was rendered in ice. A woman commented that it was beautiful. "Yes," said her companion. "Who did it? Epstein?" "Don't be silly," the other responded, "Epstein only works in chopped liver."

This rich rapestry of more than three centuries of Jewish cooking and food preferences is a gourmet's delight as well as an unexpected journey into Jewish history and sociology. It is highly recommended for every Jewish household. Bon appetit!

Tarragon Extra Theatre offers two play with a real sting

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you like theatre with a shtuch (sting), see Nazi-Jew-Queer and Lebensborn, two one-act plays running at Tarragon Extra Space until May 22.

The strangely-titled opener is a bravura one-man performance by the very talented Jewish actor, Michael Achtman, that is supposed to show the similarities between white supremacists and anti-Semites. This may be Achtman's intention but his writing and acting are better than his ability to prove this point, unfortunately.

Using a self-hating Jew to express anti-Semitism, Achtman makes the usual jokes about bar mitzvahs and kosher egg rolls. What every playwright should keep in mind is that making fun of the Jewish middle class can be a deadly game. Why do the foibles of this group offer so much grist for playwrights in many recent productions? Is there a connection between anti-Semitism in its more overt forms and the plays which tap into the latent feelings against some Jews? It's an easy way to get laughs. In fact, the opening night audience seemed too eager in this respect.

Despite this, Nazi-Jew-Queer is worth seeing because the white supremacist out on a gay-bashing spree and the homosexual talking frankly of his passions are so powerfully presented. And also because this is where alternative theatre is at these days and a theatregoer needs more than Neil Simon to keep up.

And remember, alternative theatre often means frontal nudity and this play has it (male variety).

The second play, Lebensborn written and performed by Sabina Fella, is about a German girl who wants to bear children for Hitler. It is well acted and well written with surprisingly humorous sketches, but it appears to be a work in progress.

It fails to complement any theme of the first play, which is very strong. Since the two are always shown together, one might expect Lebensborn to illuminate a theme of Nazi-Jew-Queer.

A delightful bonus for the evening is the introduction (in drag) given by Fella for Achtman's play, and by Achtman for his co-performer's outing. Both use the style of the social commentary German Kabaret to lecture the audience, tongue-in-cheek.

A fine selection of Jewish lullabies

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is insufficient to say that, almost universally, the lullaby is a human being's first exposure to music. It is also the first exposure to family relationships, to the special love that a mother (and a father, and a grandparent, and an aunt and uncle) has for a child.

And the musical talents of the person singing the lullaby has absolutely no relation to the warmth and security that the child gets from hearing it.

(I can say that with some authority, because my own children, who have perfect pitch, the ability to sing complicated tunes and lovely voices, and now tell me kindly that I shouldn't worry about singing along on Friday night — they will sing to me — please, nevertheless were enraptured by lullabies I sang to them when they were babies.)

A recently released tape, From Generation to Generation: A Legacy of Lullabies; traditional lullabies in Yiddish, Ladino and Hebrew, sung by Tanja Solnik (DreamSong Recordings, 1993) is a wonderful sample of those very special songs.

Spanning the Jewish experience, from Eastern Europe to Sephardic lands and finally to Israel, the selections are a fine education in what used to be learned almost incidentally in one's childhood home.

The Yiddish tunes are the most familiar to many of us — Abraham Goldfaden's Rozhinkes Mit Mandlen, Oifn Pripetshik, Zing Faygeleh Zing.

It is interesting to see that the Sephardic lullabies have the same lilting, gentle tunes, reminiscent of the slowly rocking cradle.

A Legacy of Lullabies is available at Hebrew bookstores, particularly Israel's.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Ivan and Abraham: With good reviews in the American press, writer-director Yolande Zauberman's film Ivan and Abraham opened last weekend at the Madison and Carlton cinemas in Toronto.

Winner of the Grand Prize at the 1993 Moscow Film Festival, this lyrical, subtitled film was shot in high-contrast black-and-white in the region of Belarus and at the last standing shtetl in the Ukraine. Set somewhere on the Polish border in the 1930s, the film paints a moving portrait of daily life before the great devastation of the war, showing shtetls, Christian villages, Gypsy encampments and Russian raiding parties.

Abraham is a 9-year-old Jewish boy whose best friend Ivan, a 14-year-old Christian, lives with his family as an apprentice. When Abraham's family attempts to send Ivan away, Abraham runs away in revolt against his severe, Orthodox grandfather. His sister Rachel goes in search of him with her friend Aaron, a young communist. All four discover a world of adventure, emotion and danger.

A Theatrical Hit: A rogue's gallery of political hitmen is the subject of the Stephen Sondheim-John Weidman musical Assassins, which recently enjoyed a Canadian premiere under the auspices of Toronto's Eclectic Theatre in association with Grassy Knoll Productions.

Assassins focuses on the twisted aspirations and deeds of such notorious killers and would-be killers as John Wilkes Booth, Sara Jane Moore, Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, Lee Harvey Oswald, John Hinkley and others. The director is Jordan Merkur and cast members include Barbara Barsky, Paulina Gillis and Robert Macaulay. "Bloodcurdlingly funny," said the London Sunday Times. Playing through May 28 at the Canadian Stage Downstairs Theatre, 26 Berkeley St. The May 24 performance is an AIDS benefit. For tickets, phone (416) 368-3110.

The Ambitious Bubbie: Marion Schwarz, the Jewish grandmother behind the television series The Bubbie Break, received some naches recently. Her show, which originated on a local cable channel several seasons ago, was picked up by two American channels — OBC in New Jersey and KUSK in Arizona. The Bubbie Break focuses on light and serious grandparenting topics and features interviews with the likes of Alan Dershowitz and Paul Molitor. "I'm going to be in 50 U.S. channels before the end of 1994," Schwarz predicted.

Dance at Leah Posluns: The Me'irim Dance Company, a professional, cultural and educational project of the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto, introduces its spring season with Different Trains and Other Dances, May 24 and 25, 8 p.m. The title work, by Shula Saltzman, confronts the Holocaust and the nature of evil in 30 minutes of dance and drama. Other works include the abstract dances Yerusha and Man's Domain, the former set to the music of Canadian Jewish composer Srul Irving Glick.

To the Four Corners of the Earth is a solo from Sephardic Memories, a piece about the exile of the Jews from Spain, while Lumbar Thought is a duet based on an essay by Umberto Eco about blue jeans. For tickets, call Leah Posluns at (416) 630-6752 or Ticket Master, (416) 870-8000.

Blockbuster Exhibition at AGO: Tickets recently went on sale for the Art Gallery of Ontario's upcoming exhibit From Cezanne to Matisse: Great French Paintings from The Barnes Foundation. Artists include Renoir, Matisse, Cezanne, Toulouse-Lautrec, Picasso, van Gogh, Monet, Manet, Seuraut, Rousseau, Modigliani and Braque. Toronto is the show's only Canadian stop; it's due here Sept. 17 and runs to Dec. 31. For tickets ($15 for adults), phone TicketKing (416) 872-3333.

At the Israel Museum, Jerusalem: Continuing through Aug. 29 is the exhibition Back To The Shtetl, featuring some 300 objects collected in the Pale of Settlement during an ethnographic study before World War I. The expedition was headed by An-Sky, otherwise known as Shlomo Rappaport, author of the play The Dybbuk. Much of the collection was lost in the war but a portion was saved and regathered in the State Ethnographic Museum of St. Petersburg. Items such as musical instruments, religious artifacts, clothing, paintings, recordings of folk stories amount to a massive re-creation of shtetl life in Ukraine and Belarus.

Also at the Israel Museum is Postcards From The Edge: Greetings from Sarajevo. In this compelling exhibit, Bosnian artists depict the war that has torn their lives apart, and seek moral support from Israel. Using familiar icons of Western cinematic and pop culture, such as Christmas cherubs and Andy Warhol's Campbell's soup can, the artists have made startling postcards. For example, Warhol's soup can is riddled with bullets and Rhett Butler is shown carrying Scarlett away from the crumbling skyline of Sarajevo. The Scream, Edvard Munch's eerie painting of a figure screaming on a bridge, is shown with the ruins of the Bosnian city in the background and the caption, "Sarajevo 1993."

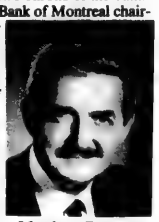
Bankers to be honored

TORONTO — For the first time, state of Israel Bonds in Canada will be honoring two barons of the banking world — Bank of Montreal chairman Matthew Barrett and his counterpart at the Bank of Nova Scotia, Cedric Ritchie.



Matthew Barrett

Canadian banks have been increasingly cooperative in the Israel Bond high yield Note Program, which began in 1975. A note, taken out by individuals, organizations or synagogues often for a million dollars or more, is in effect a bank loan which Israel guarantees. Israel pays interest on the note in the same way it offers a return on other Bonds. Many notes are financed using LIBOR (London Interbank Overnight Rate) and in most cases the rates Israel pays are higher than LIBOR, thus allowing the note holder to turn a small profit or at worst, break even.

"Our tribute to Mr. Barrett and Mr. Ritchie demonstrates our appreciation for bank assistance to state of Israel Bonds," says Canada-Israel Securities, Limited chairman, Alex Grossman.

He believes that Ritchie and Barrett's agreement to be recognized by Bonds sends a strong message to the investment community.

"It confirms what many investment analysts have already pointed out. Israel's economy is one of the world's most dynamic, and Bonds are an attractive, secure reflection of that growth."

A Toronto cocktail reception is planned for Barrett on May 24, with a luncheon on June 24. Ritchie will be honored at a June 2 reception in Toronto, followed by a Montreal dinner on June 15.

Tips From Pros

By YARON HAIK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Playing the financial markets as if they're a crapshoot in a Las Vegas casino or trying to "beat the markets" to make a financial killing is both unwise and unlikely. A more sensible approach to investing, recommended by many financial advisors as a means of protecting investors from a capricious economic world, is called "dollar cost averaging."

Dollar cost averaging is the investing of a fixed amount of money in an investment, a mutual fund for example, at regular intervals — such as $100 dollars per month. By following this strategy, investors will actually lower the average cost of their investments. If you have lower costs, then you have more profit.

The principle of this strategy is simple. Since financial markets fluctuate, individuals that invest once a year may find the value of their investment either rises, falls or stagnates over a period of time. But with dollar cost averaging, an investor purchases consistently without having to guess when to invest. You buy fewer units when the price is high and more units when the price is low.

For example, you decide to invest $100 a month in a mutual fund. The first month the fund's units cost $10 each — so your $100 buys 10 units.

During the next four months, the fund's price per unit rises to $11; drops to $9; and then $8. Over the four-month period your $100 a month is invested at these different prices so you purchase 42.7 units — or 2.7 units more than if you had invested a lump sum of $400 at $10 per unit, which would have given you only 40 units.

Month	Unit Price	Units Bought	Amount Invested	Total Value
1	$15	6.667	$100	$100.00
2	$13	7.696	$100	$186.67
3	$14	7.143	$100	$301.03
4	$12	8.333	$100	$358.02
5	$16	6.250	$100	$577.36
6	$15	6.667	$100	$641.28

Average Price	Total Units	Average Cost Per Unit
$14.17	42.752	$14.03

The advantage of dollar cost averaging is that investors don't have to invest a large amount of money all at once or worry about timing the market. There is no need to study trends — attempting to determine when to buy, and where the unit value will be tomorrow, next month, or six months from now — because investors are buying units consistently and fluctuations in the market balance out over time.

Furthermore, dollar cost averaging eliminates the temptation to stop buying when the unit price goes down in value or to invest wildly when the units begin rising in value. In short, investors using dollar cost averaging are following the classic advice of buy low and sell high.

Here's an example of dollar cost averaging when prices are fluctuating. Let's say you invested $100 a month over a six-month period. During the first month the unit price was $15 — you bought 6.66 units. Over the next six months, the price swung up and down, reaching as high as $16 and falling as low as $12, and finally returning to $15.

Your $600 invested over six months is now worth $641.28 — a gain of 6.9 per cent. If you had made a single investment in month one, you would still only have $600 at the end of the six-month period. Thus investors using dollar cost averaging have come out ahead.

Dollar cost averaging is a concept that can as easily be applied to your favorite stock as well as mutual funds. Talk with your investment advisor today to learn more about the advantages of dollar-cost-averaging investments. In the long run it could make you a winner.

Ra'anana project growing fast

TORONTO — The glossy brochure for Central Park Ra'anana, Eli Rubinstein's new subdivision, doesn't mince words. The project, it proclaims, attracts "a very select group of professionals and academicians who seek a new, quality life-style."

Rubinstein, a well-known Toronto developer, is counting on quality and uniqueness to turn a profit in Israel's burgeoning building business. So far, the strategy seems to be working.

Central Park Ra'anana, is situated in one of Israel's fastest growing communities north of Tel Aviv.

It includes over 750 apartments in nine different buildings on land acquired with the help of Israel economic consul in Toronto Benny Noy. Half of the units are for sale; the others are for rent at rates that are reasonable by Israeli standards — $500 to $850 (US) a month.

Rubinstein reports more than 600 applicants for 180 rentals that he hopes will be ready for occupancy by September.

Prices for the apartments to be sold start at approximately $150,000 (US) for the smallest units, and all but 30 have been bought.

In addition to Ra'anana's chronic apartment shortage, Rubinstein cites a long list of extras to explain his project's popularity — built-in closets, ceramic tiles and the neighborhood's design. There's a pedestrian mall running through the centre of the subdivision and sidewalks that don't meet the street.

"At all strategic points we have these walkways that go above the road," he points out.

Rubinstein is also developing Tel Aviv's tallest building, a 30-storey combined condominium and luxury suite hotel development, across from the United States embassy. This one won't be finished until next summer. The hotel portion will be sold to one of the chains that, according to Rubinstein, are "displaying keen interest."

Israel's economic consul in Toronto, Ben Noy, believes Rubinstein's success symbolizes the opportunities available in Israel for Canadian developers.

"As strong commercial and residential demand grows, North American construction methods will become increasingly important.

In Tel Aviv, for example, Rubinstein is relying on pre-fabrication to compensate for a diminishing labor force. With restrictions on the number of Palestinians permitted to work in Israel, builders are importing employees from countries such as Romania. But there aren't enough, so Rubinstein foresees developers becoming more innovative, in order to complete their projects.

Yet, with all the challenges he's encountered, Rubinstein is hardly deterred, especially when he compares Israel's environment to Canada's.

"Here, it hardly pays to do anything," he observes. "In Israel, our main challenge right now is to find things not to do."

TRADE AGREEMENT SIGNED

Trading partnership formed between Israel and China

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Phil Dror, former Israeli minister of economic affairs, was in Toronto recently to discuss investment and trade opportunities between Israel and China.

In an interview after a luncheon sponsored by Mendel Green and Canada-Israel Securities Ltd., Dror explained that his main purpose for addressing the group, which included Dror Zeigerman, consul general of Israel and Tang Fuquan, consul general of China was to "update Israel's economic situation in view of the peace agreement."

He warned that the peace accord would only be a success if economic measures were implemented to ensure a better standard of living for those living in Gaza and the West Bank.

"The World Bank has set aside $2.4 billion to implement projects in Gaza and the West Bank," Dror said, adding that such projects would target improving the basic infrastructure of the region.

International think-tank

In the first three years, $1.2 billion will be phased in; this will be in addition to any donations. He said this step will encourage business interests by clearly illustrating that stability is coming to the region.

While the process will be gradual, the jobs that will ultimately be created by such projects will mean that fewer workers will have to leave Gaza for employment. Dror said being able to work close to home will increase the quality of living by fostering family values and a better home environment for those who previously had to spend weeks away from their families.

Dror said the drain such projects will create on Israel's cheap labor force will allow — or force — the modernization of industries like agriculture and construction.

"[Our] great efforts of 30 or 40 years are beginning to bear fruit," Dror said. Other countries are beginning to recognize Israel's economic revolution.

With 25 per cent of the country's workforce holding academic degrees, Dror said Israelis are more than ready to contribute to world development. One day, he said, we'll be able to see a Soviet, an Israeli and an American scientist all working together in the same lab — an international think-tank.

International capital is now increasingly being invested in Israel. Venture and start-up funds total $100 million for the past two years and over 60 Israeli companies are listed on the New York Stock Exchange or NASDAQ.

"Israel has matured and developed into a rich country and as a result other nations — South Korea, Japan, India, parts of South Africa and China — have established business connections."

China's relationship with Israel was originally formed to facilitate defence-related projects. It has since expanded. "China needs the systems that Israel has already perfected," Dror said. These include agriculture and irrigation systems, laser and medical technology, and education systems.

An example of this is the recent agreement of cooperation between the agriculture faculty at Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Beijing Agriculture University.

The agreement provides for Hebrew University to host visiting Chinese scholars for advanced study at the faculty of agriculture in Rehovot. Members of the faculty will visit the Beijing institution to give lectures and conduct seminars. The agreement also provides for an exchange of scientific articles and books published by researchers at the two institutions and a general sharing of information.

Upgrade facilities

Dror said this is only a taste of what is to come. "Israel will be able to export a lot to China without becoming a threat," he said, citing the differece in the size of their economies as the reason.

And Israel is perfectly located for those Chinese manufacturing plants that are looking to upgrade facilities and export their products directly from Israel, thereby benefitting from Israel's free trade policies with other countries.

Asked how this could affect Canadian exporters or investors, Dror replied, "Canada should benefit because many [companies] will be able to use Israel for R&D prior to exporting goods from Israel directly to China."

He also pointed out that Canadian capital invested in Israel-based companies could, in turn, be re-invested in China.

"This will benefit everyone," he said.

Chinese scholars in Israel

REHOVOT — The People's Republic of China is looking to the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel to provide it with some of the knowhow it requires for developing advanced solar technology.

In pursuit of this goal, the Chinese Academy of Sciences recently sent here two researchers, Kou Qing and Yao Chengcai, who point out that their country's growing interest in solar energy is spurred by the difficulties it faces in supplying its huge population with electricity, as well as by its mounting concern over pollution caused by fossil fuels.

Kou, 26, is from the Institute of Electrical Engineering in Beijing, an affiliate of the Chinese Academy of Sciences and China's foremost energy research facility. It has recently helped establish the first of 10 solar power plants scheduled to be built in Tibet, a region poor in fossil fuels where many villages are still without electricity.

Of particular interest to Kou is the development of systems based on solar cells that use concentrated sunlight at selected spectral bands. In a research project supervised by Prof. Amnon Yogev, Head of the Weizmann's Energy Research Center, he is trying to determine the part of the sun spectrum most suitable for operating such cells.

In his free time, Lou is studying Hebrew, hoping to stay here for his doctoral studies and become the first Chinese scientist with a Ph.D. in solar energy. After eventually returning to China, he hopes to initiate collaboration between the Weizmann and his Institute in Beijing, a prestigious institution that accepts graduates from only the 100 best Chinese universities and has approximately 50 applicants for every opening.

Yao, 28, who was sent here together with Kou in January 1993, is a researcher and lecturer in solar engineering at the University of Science and Technology in China (USTC), a top Chinese institution located in Hefei, some 2,000 km south of Beijing. His wife, Zhou Jieying, who was his classmate at USTC, joined him here in October.

Now claiming Yao's attention is a research project headed by Michael Epstein, director of the Institute's Solar Research Facilities Unit. The aim of the project is to transform solar energy into storable and transportable chemical fuel that can be used hundreds of miles away from where the sun's rays are collected.

For a scientist sent by his country to learn advanced technology abroad, Yao has an unusual background. He is the eldest son of poor peasants who live in a rural part of southern China and still have no phone. They didn't have enough money to send all of their five children to school, so that one of them wound up with only two years of schooling. Yao managed to finish high school and enter university, which at the time was free for children from indigent families who received high grades on their entrance exam.

The Weizmann assignment makes him the pride of his parents' entire village, Yao says. When he goes home, he intends to teach his students everything he learned at Weizmann's solar tower.

His ambition is to play a role in the design of the first Chinese solar thermal power plant, which is currently being planned. He also intends to participate in the development of small solar energy systems that will be commercialized by his university. Such undertakings have become an important source of income for Chinese universities since the government drastically cut its support for academic institutions in recent years.

Prior to coming to the Weizmann Institute for their first trip abroad, Kou and Yao could find practically no literature about Israel and hence arrived knowing practically nothing about the country. But now that they have enjoyed the beauty of its landscapes and the friendship of its population, they will return home ready to serve as unofficial ambassadors of Israel.

Prof. Yogev holds the Stephen and Mary Meadow Chair of Laser Photochemistry.

Joint research project

JERUSALEM — Researchers from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem are participating in a joint research project with scientists from China and Germany to examine psychological reactions and growth of poplar shoots under stress conditions of low water supply and high salinity.

Their aim is to develop efficient methods for determining which trees show the most tolerance to the above conditions, and to achieve rapid growth and propagation.

China is currently trying to expand its forest lands, particularly in those areas not under agricultural cultivation, in order to cope with a shortage of lumber, to improve environmental quality, and to fight desertification. Poplar trees are especially suited for this purpose. The advantage of poplars rests in their ability to adapt to varying climatic conditions and in their rapid growth, which makes them suitable for commercial exploitation within a relatively short periood of time (15-20 years). However, mass planting of such trees in China is being delayed because of problems of low and varying distribution of rainfall and unproductive soil.

The Israeli team will examine biotechnical aspects of the reproduction of poplars through tissue cultures and will carry out molecular tests of resistance to drought. The Chinese researchers will be responsible for testing various strains under field conditions of salinity and drought, while the German partners will examine the absorption and distribution of ions in the trees under conditions of salinity.

Picking your own crops yeilds a quality harvest

TORONTO — At present the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture lists in excess of 375 Pick Your Own (PYO) operations. The combined value of all Ontario PYO crops is estimated to be in the range of $25 million annually.

The first organized Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food (OMAF) listing of Ontario PYO venues was assembled slightly more than 20 years ago; it ran to approximately 70 entries. At its peak, around 1985, the annual list hit 400 businesses: numbers dropped noticeably in the years immediately following then, but they have begun to rise once more, a fact some local experts have tied directly to the economy.

Certainly consumers are conscious these days of value for money — and there is no doubt picking your own offers good value. But it is also true the consumer today has a considerable appreciation for going right to the source, to be sure of quality and freshness and simply because the journey can be such a pleasant one.

In the early days the average PYO enterprise may have been small-scale, low-key, no-frills, concentrating on the crop and the crop alone. Today, by contrast, there is no longer one predominant style. The understated, simple, one-and two-crop operations still thrive, but there are many other types of PYO places too, ranging all the way up to enormous ventures offering baked goodies, pony rides, haunted barns, children's playgrounds, hayrides and more — something for the whole family, as it's often described.

By far the greatest number of Pick Your Own businesses roughly 173) can be found in the western part of the province, running from the shores of Lake Erie to Windsor and up through Owen Sound, including Kitchener-Waterloo and the Niagara Peninsula.

This region is followed equally by the Central and Eastern regions (98 operations each). (Central region extends from Oshawa in the east to Mississauga in the west, up to Thornbury and along Georgian Bay to Hunstville and down along the western side of Lake Simcoe. The Eastern region stretches from Port Hope to the Ottawa River and up to Algonquin Park.) Even though the Northern region does not have the same number of Pick Your Own operations as the rest of the province, there are about five farms that offer different commodities but most offer berries — strawberries and raspberries.

Raspberries

Strawberries are the drawing card, first and foremost. In fact, of all the PYO operations in business, some 247 of them feature strawberry picking, with or without other crops. Sixty per cent or so of Ontario's total strawberry production is harvested in this fashion and for raspberries the numbers are even higher — 75 to 80 per cent of Ontario raspberries are harvested by the consumer.

In fact, the range of Pick Your Own crops goes much wider than just berries. The current OMAF PYO Guide lists, as PYO crops, apples, beans, beets, blueberries, broccoli, brussel sprouts, cabbage, carrots, cauliflower, cherries, corn, cucumber, currants, eggplant, gooseberries, grapes, onions, peaches, pears, peas, peppers, plums, raspberries, pumpkins, squash, strawberries and tomatoes. And there are other crops in smaller quantities, in addition to those just listed.

Most successful crops, from the consumer's point of view, seem to be those most easily harvested and those that can be seen before they are harvested (tomatoes rather than potatoes; raspberries rather than rutabaga, for example).

A very limited amount of asparagus is available through PYO outlets, the first available crop of the growing year, starting sometime in May. After that come strawberries, then peas, raspberries and other midsummer fruits and vegetables and eventually tomatoes, sweet corn and even pumpkins, carrots, cauliflower and apples, taking the consumer all the way through October.

Summer is obviously the first season one thinks of, in considering a PYO trip, but in recent years, September and October have become increasingly popular months in the business — especially for weekend family trips incorporating apple picking, choosing a pumpkin, maybe even a hayride.

For a free copy of Foodland Ontario's 1994 PYO Guide or insert with updated farm listings plus available Home Hardware coupons, please contact the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture, Food and Rural Affairs Information Centre, 801 Bay Street, Toronto, M7A 2B2 or phone 1-800-567-8898 outside Toronto, 326-3400 within the metro area.

TORONTO — Outlet stores are in.

So says Herman Ross, general manager of the Harry Rosen outlet store in Markville Shopping Centre, Markham. Open since August 1992, Harry's provides customers with Harry Rosen clothing at sale prices.

There is an organized chaos to this store. Tables piled high with dress pants and sweaters occupy the centre section. At the back, rows and rows of every suit imaginable hang waiting for the right buyer. Throughout the rest of the store stand racks of ties, socks, leather jackets, casual and dress shirts, shorts, coats — the list goes on.

Ross says the outlet concept hit North America 15 years ago, first in the United States, but has since taken off in Canada. With 23 Harry Rosen Stores in Canada, this outlet is the only one of its kind in the country.

"There was a growing need for having an outlet centre because Harry Rosen is a major force in menswear in Canada and we felt it would be a good time to develop this type of format using the excess merchandise that would normally sit in the warehouse," said Ross.

And business is so good, he says, he can foresee expansion plans in the near future.

Because it is the only store of its kind, customers come from all over Canada to shop there. Ross says there are line-ups in the store evenings and on weekends.

"We've created what's called a destination store. Our customer base is not here, it's everywhere. So people have to plan their shopping trips."

Signs in the store quote 40 to 80 per cent off merchandise. And staff pack a lot of clothing into their 10,000 square feet of space. In total they carry 21,000 pieces of clothing — 2,200 suits, 5,000 pairs of pants. Prices range from $9.95 to $1,000. Once an item has been on the shelf for four months at regular discount prices, it is further reduced.

"The customer today is very astute. People want good value, recognized value," said Ross.

"The Harry Rosen name is very strong. We're kind of unusual for an outlet store. The typical ones carry low- or medium-quality merchandise. We're unique because we carry medium- to high-end quality and exclusive lines at sale prices."

Ross also feels the store has been successful because they offer experienced staff to customers, another perk usually absent from outlet stores.

"If you combine our staff, we probably have 300 years of experience," he said.

Quebec Immigration Minister John Ciaccia (centre) signs a second accord with the Jewish community to facilitate the arrival of another 100 Jewish families from the former Soviet Union. Quebec to admit 100 Jewish families

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec government and the Jewish community put their signatures to a second historic accord on May 13 that will facilitate the arrival of another 100 Jewish families from the former Soviet Union.

John Ciaccia, Quebec's minister of international affairs, immigration and cultural communities, referred to the virtually unqualified success of the first accord — launched in April 1992 under then-immigration minister Monique Gagnon-Tremblay — as a main reason for repeating the initiative.

"It's been highly successful," Ciaccia said at a combined signing ceremony, press conference and reception in the boardroom of Federation CJA.

The accord, he said, is a "new partnership with cultural communities."

According to Joel Moss, Montreal director for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), the second wave of Jewish immigrants from the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), the Baltic countries, and Georgia should begin arriving in Montreal by October 1995.

Putting their signatures to the accord at Cummings House were Ciaccia; Steven Drysdale, executive vice-president of Federation CJA; and Darius Kiaizadeh, a Montreal JIAS vice-president.

The first accord, described as a "pilot project," got underway about two years ago following months of negotiations initiated by the Jewish community. The community was hoping Quebec could help expedite the immigration of Jews from the Soviet Union who were fearing a resurgence of anti-Semitism.

Since the spring of 1993, 72 families have settled in Montreal. Another 10 to 15 families are due to come over in the coming months.

Ciaccia said the newcomers have been highly-motivated, as well as increasingly adept at French and, almost without exception, are gainfully employed.

The Jewish community model has been so successful, in fact, that Ciaccia said a similar accord is now in effect with the Ismailian community.

According to Moss, the second protocol is essentially the same as the first signed two years ago.

The main responsibility of the Quebec government will be to "fast-track" the processing of applicants and to give approval to the list of about 100 candidate families supplied by Federation CJA and JIAS (Ottawa, however, conducts medical and security checks of applicants and has final say.)

The government will also provide materials to the immigrants so they can start learning French before arriving.

Once here, the families will be able to enroll in the COFI program, seven months of government-sponsored French-language courses that pays a living allowance to participants.

Selection of the second hundred families will be based on family links to Montreal, as well as job and language skills.

The Jewish community, for its part, will guarantee to provide the basic needs of the families — such as housing, clothing and food — for a one-year period.

The Jewish community is also committed to helping the newcomers find employment, creating the proper environment for perfecting French skills, and facilitating "socio-economic" integration into Quebec society.

Arafat 'explains' jihad remark

Seeks peaceful crusade

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Claiming he was the victim of a linguistic snafu, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat stressed last week that a call he had previously made for a "jihad" (holy war) to regain Jerusalem had been misinterpreted.

Arafat's comments came on the same day that the Israel Defence Force evacuated its last installation in the Gaza Strip, bringing to an end 27 years of Israeli administration of the region.

Speaking in Oslo last Wednesday, Arafat said that he had indeed called for a jihad during a speech at a South Africa mosque a week earlier. But he said he intended the word to mean a peaceful crusade rather than a holy war, as the Arabic expression is generally interpreted in English.

"I'll continue my jihad for peace," he told a news conference in Oslo.

Arafat asserted that he was committed to the Declaration of Principles signed last fall with Israel and that he was opposed to violence and terror.

Arafat had made the speech while in South Africa to attend the inauguration of President Nelson Mandela. Later, a tape recording of the speech was played on Israel Radio, prompting a furor.

"Jihad will continue and Jerusalem is not for the Palestinian people. It is for all the Muslim people," Arafat said in the speech. "Our main battle is Jerusalem."

Both Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres stated that the remark could throw the entire peace process with the Palestinians into question.

But the next day, appearing at a joint news conference with Arafat, Peres said he was satisfied with Arafat's explanation.

The two men had travelled to Oslo to attend an award ceremony honoring the role Norway played in the back-channel diplomacy that led to the signing of the Declaration of Principles.

Former U.S. President Jimmy Carter was also on hand to unveil a monument presented by the Carter-Menil Human Rights Foundation and to present a $100,000 check to the Norwegian Institute for Applied Social Science, which had helped arrange the series of secret negotiations between Israel and the PLO last year.

Underscoring how strongly he initially felt about Arafat's jihad remark, Peres said on first arriving in Oslo that he would boycott any public gathering Arafat attended until the PLO leader personally announced that he was fully committed to the Declaration of Principles, was opposed to violence and terror and was bent upon pursuing peace.

The remark was also taken quite seriously by the U.S. State Department.

Strobe Talbott, deputy secretary of state, speaking to Jewish leaders in New York, called on Arafat to repudiate the statement.

"As Rabin said, if Arafat's statement is not clarified to the extent of repudiation, it will constitute a violation of his letter to Rabin," Talbott told the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

He referred to letters exchanged between Rabin and Arafat last September which spelled out their commitments to one another and paved the way for the signing of the Declaration of Principles.

Talbott said that as soon as the United States heard of the statement, "we instructed our ambassador in Oslo to clarify it for us."

While Talbott had not heard the clarification Arafat issued from Oslo and thus declined to comment directly on it, he said he was hard-pressed to understand how jihad could be defined as a struggle for peace.

Lester Pollack, chair of the Conference of Presidents, rejected the clarification as "inadequate, insufficient and disingenuous."

Arafat will head a party of Palestinians due to arrive in the autonomous Jericho district during the first week of June, senior Arafat adviser Nabil Sha'ath announced in Cairo last week.

According to Sha'ath, Arafat intends to supervise implementation of the autonomy in person. Sha'ath did not say how long Arafat would spend in Jericho.

Israel handed over the 24-square-mile Jericho district to Palestinian control May 13.

The official hand-over of Gaza was accomplished during a brief signing ceremony last Tuesday, and the evacuation of the last Israeli installations there took place early the following day.

A convoy of eight Israeli jeeps left Ansar Prison in Gaza City Wednesday. Jubilant Palestinians marked the occasion by throwing stones at the departing troops.

No formal ceremony was held to mark the hand-over of authority, although one had been planned. The ceremony was canceled at the insistence of settlers living in the Gush Katif bloc within Gaza, who viewed the Israeli pullout as a surrender to the PLO and an abandonment of the settlers.

Maj.-Gen. Nasser Yussef, commander of Palestinian security forces in Gaza and Jericho, held a news conference at the Ansar Prison after the Israeli troops withdrew.

Asked how he would deal with members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement, which has vowed to carry out attacks against Israeli soldiers and settlers, Yussef said he had no intention of engineering confrontations with Hamas.

Yussef added that he had reached a full understanding with Hamas representatives on the role their group would play under autonomy. But he did not specify what that role would be.

In the days leading up to the transfer of authority in Gaza, Yussef had stated that he would disarm all Palestinians who were not members of the police or security forces. But later, he spoke only of having their weapons registered.

Yussef stated that 3,000 Palestinian police have so far arrived in Gaza and that more were due soon.

Brig.-Gen. Doron Almog, the Israeli commander in charge of Gaza, told reporters that he expected more terror activity to emanate from Gaza.

His immediate superior, Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilnai, the commander of the southern sector, told reporters that the pullout had gone well.

The withdrawal "went smoothly, not just here, but everywhere," he said. "We are going out. That is it."

Sex on agenda at seniors' forum

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Seniors attending an Independence in the Year of the Family day at Bernard Betel Centre recently were advised to set aside the inhibitions on sexual matters fostered by their parents.

"They meant well but control through fear doesn't work," said Sue Johanson, well-known TV commentator and downtown sex clinic worker.

Her up-front advice, which asked them to think on why many are opposed to oral sex and "do-it-yourself" sex, was received in good humor by the well-attended session held in the chapel of the centre.

The mood was exemplified by an elderly man who interrupted her talk to ask: "If sex is so exciting, why do I fall asleep?"

When she showed a female condom, she was asked immediately by several women where it could be obtained. Johanson said she got her supply in England and told her audience not to believe newspaper reports that it would be available in Canada in six months.

She downplayed fear of AIDS among seniors, but suggested that anyone who has concerns about herpes or venereal warts should insist on a condom being used by his or her partner.

Johanson's talk was only one feature of a lively day which saw dozens of seniors get their canes or walkers adjusted or equipped with new rubber tips and handles for free at a first-ever walking clinic staffed by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. Some were advised to change their style of gait.

John May, a Canada Post letter carrier, said he got 100 new applications from people who want a relative or friend advised if mail piles up in the letter box or there are other suspicious circumstances.

In the main auditorium, many seniors got up and danced waltzes, tangos, cha-chas and line dancing under guidance from instructor Stella Switzer. At one exhibit, giant shoehorns, bridge card holders for arthritics and no-tie shoe laces were available.

But the "buzz" of the day came from Johanson and her talk on sex. She was invited by Henry Cranston and Charles Goeldner, co-chairs of the La'Briyut Wellness Centre at Betel.

Men who suffer from premature ejaculation were so frightened by their parents' attiudes toward sex that they learned to be "sneaky and fast," Johanson said. She said only five per cent of male impotence is psychological, with insufficient blood supply to the penis accounting for the rest.

Tranquillizers and high blood pressure medicines are also causes of impotence. Men who go looking for other sex partners to solve their impotence will find that they become impotent with the new choice in two months "and the inevitable skirt chasing will lead to a wrecked marriage."

She scoffed at ideas that the size of the male organ has anything to do with satisfying the female partner.

The seniors were asked to pass advice along to their newly-married sons and daughters to have a weekend way from the first-born child "to kick start the low sex drive" which follows birth. Also, she said, six months after the first child is born, couples should have four sessions of marriage counselling bcause their lifestyle is affected so seriously.

What has not changed in the world of new sexual mores is the need for physical closeness, petting, snuggling and cuddling, she said.

She quoted a Masters and Johnson study of 1986 claiming that the level of sexual excitement for both men and women is higher when sex is done alone. "This is not a put-down of your partner, but you can do it all by yourself."

Study on Jewish students urged by U of T chancellor

By PHIL FINE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As many as 3,000 — over five per cent — of the University of Toronto's 52,000 students may be Jewish. But only a fraction are affiliated with U of T's Jewish Students Union (JSU), the chancellor of the university said here recently.

Rose Wolfe told a Brotherhood breakfast at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue that JSU's student leaders tend to be bright, attractive and well spoken. But the vast majority of Jewish students at U of T are not connected with the JSU, said Wolfe, who spoke on Jewish student life at the university.

"The average student gets lost; the professors don't really know them," Wolfe told the breakfast. She added that even many Hebrew day school graduates — students with strong Jewish backgrounds — tend not to associate with the JSU.

Wolfe admitted her findings were anecdotal and unscientific. Indeed, she added, there was a critical need for systematic research into Jewish student life at U of T. Such research, Wolfe told a reporter, would attempt to find out who Jewish students are, what type of experiences they have and what support systems they need.

She noted how almost all of the Jewish student leaders whom she has met at U of T were clear-headed about their future.

'All of them had done very, very well. They knew what they were going to do," Wolfe remarked. "They were all going on to post-graduate work in Canada or the United States."

Rose Wolfe

Wolfe said she thought Jewish students at U of T should be able to enjoy a better — and richer — Jewish experience. But she said she was unsure if Jewish enrichment programs should cover everyone or just the small number of students who are already Jewishly committed.

"Do we put all of our money into the Jewish Students Union, which caters to a relatively small group and leave over 2,000 kids completely untouched?" Wolfe asked.

She said she was surprised as chancellor to discover that Jews not only made up a high number of U of T faculty positions but a high number of top positions in those faculties. She said most Jewish faculty members at U of T were not lukewarm to Jewish issues, and many showed interest in a campaign to endow the university with a chair in Judaic Studies.

Fielding questions after her speech, Wolfe told a listener that parents must realize students who leave home to go to university are more susceptible to intermarriage than students who stay behind.

"When you go out of town and your parents aren't there, it's a whole different ball game," Wolfe remarked. "You go out with whomever you want to go out with." Wolfe said parents have to keep in mind that newcomers to university campuses are necessarily exposed to new ways of thinking — many of which, she added, are both attractive and seductive.

Earlier, Wolfe was told by a York University student that York's Jewish Students Federation (JSF) was very active, catering to as many as 150 students a day. "If you went out there, you would find a rah-rah atmosphere," said JSF member Rochelle Segelbaum.

Wolfe acknowledged that Jewish student life at York could be completely different from that at U of T.

Her duties as U of T chancellor include chairing the honorary degrees committee, which this year voted unanimously to bestow an honorary doctorate upon Cito Gaston, manager of the back-to-back World Series champion Toronto Blue Jays.

'Living will' legislation concerns Quebec rabbis

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Does Quebec's new "living will" legislation give mandated individuals too much power over the lives of the physically or mentally incompetent, and thereby violate the traditional Jewish commandment to save life and prohibition against euthanasia?

Some Montreal rabbis are concerned about the halachic implications of "the mandate," a legal contract one draws up with another person empowering that person to make decisions on your behalf if and when you become incapable due to illness.

Living wills was the topic of a recent seminar for rabbis and cantors, as well as other interested medical, social service and legal professionals, organized by the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) and Federation CJA's chaplaincy services.

While active euthanasia or suicide are clearly violations of Halachah, the rabbis admit it can be difficult in some cases to draw the line. For example, does refusing treatment, as is implied in "do not resuscitate" orders, constitute suicide or is it simply letting nature take its course? For that matter, is artificial feeding or hydration a form of treatment?

Lawyer Marc Weinstein, legal counsel to the JGH, explained that the mandate is given by a person (the mandator) of full age and while in possession of their faculties, in anticipation of incapacity some day, to another person (the mandatory). The contract requires either a notarial act or the presence of two witnesses.

The mandate may provide for the administration of the property and general welfare of the mandator, as well as empower the mandatory to consent to or withhold consent for health care and to follow the mandator's instructions on when not to prolong life.

In most cases, a spouse or child is named mandatory, although more than one person can be appointed, Weinstein said.

The mandate is activated only when it is approved by a court and the mandatory must obtain a medical and psychosocial assessment of the mandator certifying that person is no longer able to make decisions.

The mandate ceases to have effect if the court finds that the mandator has become capable again.

The Quebec Civil Code stipulates that no one may undergo health care of any type without consent, so the mandatory acts as a proxy when the person is incapable of giving or refusing consent.

The 'living will' component of the mandate may, for example, ask the mandatory to "intervene to prevent the prolonging of the mandator's life if maintained only with medication, or by technical, artificial or disproportionate means" when the recommended treatment would not guarantee the patient's physical or mental recovery.

"Such wishes must be clearly expressed and carefully drafted in order to avoid any confusion with the rules concerning 'physician-assisted' suicide in the case of a terminally ill person," Weinstein emphasized.

Professor pessimistic about peace

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Anyone tempted to feel hopeful about the peace process should not spend too much time chatting with Prof. Eliyahu Kanovsky.

Visiting Montreal at the invitation of the Quebec branch of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC-Q) and Bar-Ilan University's Besa Centre for Strategic Studies, Kanovsky, one of Bar-Ilan's best known economists, had rather pessimistic things to say about the value of signing peace treaties with the Arabs.

Kanovsky's pessimism could give cause for concern since he's since been credited with predicting the energy crisis of 1973.

And he painted something of a dismal portrait for the future.

Egypt, he said, is moving towards utter collapse as a result of the growing insurgency of Islamic fundamentalism.

And that is a reality, he added, which is regrettably being ignored by the West but is worrying Israel.

At a recent breakfast hosted by the CIC-Q (and which also was attended by several prominent Quebec fancophone figures), the Winnipeg-born Kanovsky wondered about the "durability" of peace agreements given the vicissitudes and instabilities that exist within Arab governments.

Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak is very weak, for example, while Syrian President Hafez al-Assad suffers from a heart condition and Jordan's King Hussein is also in poor health, he said.

If they go "Will [peace treaties or potential peace traties] hold up?" he asked. "The situation in Egypt is almost hopeless. The regime is fragile."

Fragile, despite the fact that half of its massive debt has been wiped off the books, a gesture of gratitude made by the international financial community for backing the coalition against Iraq during the Gulf War, he said.

As Islamic extremism digs in and grabs a surer foothold in Egypt, he said, the risk to Israel could be immense. "For the extremists, the issue is not borders, but existence."

The West is foolish, he suggested, to assume that peace agreements will always be respected. "That hypothesis," Kanovsky believes, will ultimately have to be "discarded.

"I don't know what the answers are, but the issues are not being brought to the fore."

The current crisis in the Arab world, he said, dates back to the oil crisis, Kanovsky said, giving a historical overview.

During the oil boom from the mid 1970s to the early 1980s, countries like Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Sudan, Yemen, and especially Saudia Arabia, reaped the most benefits.

Saudi Arabia, for one, held one-quarter of all the oil reserves and reaped every dollar it could as the price rocketed to $40 a barrel.

The boom was a boon to other Arab countries because it brought them jobs and raised their standards of living.

But when the boom went bust as a result of a glut and dropping demand, so did the Arab world. Saudi Arabia ended up a debtor nation, foreign workers were let go, and the employment "safety valve" for the poorer Arab countries was shut off, he said.

Arab countries have not been able to subsist on the agricultural and tourism industries. The largest Arab country, Egypt, has a huge unemployment rate, is economically stagnant, and is teetering on the brink of collapse, he said.

While Israel's economic fortunes, by comparison, are very positive, with good control over its natural resources, much lowered inflation, a thriving hi-tech industry and growing economy.

Refugee process changed

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Lorne Waldman

Susan Davis

TORONTO — Federal Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi last Friday announced "interim" changes to the appeal system for rejected refugee claimants, in response to a report by two prominent Jewish activists who blasted the process as inhumane and wasteful.

Marchi announced the immediate creation of a centrally-managed government body "to take overall responsibility for the quality and consistency of the review of refused refugee claimants."

The "senior" unit, to be assisted by the Canadian office of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and by York University's Centre for Refugee Studies, will ensure that appeals officers and new recruits are trained in applying "a broader interpretation of the review criteria, which will include violations of fundamental human rights," a statement from Marchi's office said.

The wider interpretation will apply to all refused refugee claimants who have not yet had a final appeal of their case, the statement added.

Those with criminal convictions or who pose a security threat to Canada are ineligible.

As well, Marchi has called on the Canadian Council for Refugees to identify non-government agencies across Canada which could help locate rejected claimants who could benefit from the new criteria.

Those agencies — possibly to include Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) — would screen and submit the cases of all claimants, who, since Feb. 1, 1993, have been refused refugee status but are still in Canada.

Marchi's announcement came in response to a report by Susan Davis, executive director of JIAS, and Toronto immigration lawyer Lorne Waldman, who slammed Canada's appeal process for refugee claimants for its "inhumanity and financial waste."

The amount of money and resources spent by Ottawa on the system is "nonsensical," said the 80-page study, commissioned by Marchi in January and released last week.

"We found that the general institutional situation was far worse than we imagined," stated Davis and Waldman in the report, titled The Quality of Mercy.

The report called on Marchi to abolish altogether the review process for refugee claimants who have been refused permission to stay in Canada but are still in danger of being deported.

That appeal system "has failed miserably," the authors contended.

It also condemned the process which allows the immigration minister to permit a rejected claimant to stay in Canada on humanitarian or compassionate grounds. The report called this avenue vague and said it has a "hidden nature."

Waldman told The CJN he expects the whole refugee appeal process to give more weight to anti-Semitism as a reason to grant refugee status than it previously did.

He said that although Canada tends not to view personal anti-Semitism as a threat to refugee claimants, it still takes into consideration the state-sponsored anti-Semitism of various nationalist movements in the former Soviet Union.

There are currently between 30 and 40 Russian Jewish families awaiting deportation from Canada. JIAS has asked Marchi to allow them to stay on humanitarian grounds [CJN, May 12].

According to Marchi's new rules, JIAS could conceivably intervene on the families' behalf if the Russians have been in refusal since Feb. 1 of last year.

The Davis and Waldman report also called on Ottawa to allow more than 10,000 rejected claimants from China, Somalia and Haiti to stay in Canada because it is unlikely the climate in their homelands will become more hospitable.

'Speak out for Canada': Libman

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

Robert Libman

MONTREAL — D'Arcy McGee independent MNA Robert Libman called on anglophones to get their act together as momentum builds towards a provincial election and, as many predict, a referendum on sovereignty.

Because of the demographic makeup of the province, anglophones will have little impact on the overall election outcome, Libman said to a recent gathering of the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue's Leisure Institute.

But in a referendum, "every vote counts," and anglophones and allophones should be making sure the case for federalism is heard, Libman said.

"On the eve of the election, too few voices are speaking out for Canada," he said.

Anglophones number 800,000 in the province, a number potentially large enough to swing the vote against sovereignty "over the top" in a referendum, Libman said.

Libman said he would have to "live with" an honest decision made by a majority of informed Quebecers on the sovereignty question.

But he is convinced the majority of French-Canadians will vote against sovereignty if the question is not ambiguous and if they understand the "privileges" of federalism they would forfeit, as well as the negative economic repercussions that will follow the secession of Quebec.

Libman cited a 1992 La Presse-CROP poll of 1,018 Quebecers indicating that a majority think that under "sovereignty," they will still be able to use the Canadian dollar. One-third also believe they will still be able to possess a Canadian passport.

Most Quebecers — 57 per cent — think the terms "sovereignty" and "separation" mean different things.

Other Quebecers think a separate Quebec would still send MPs to Ottawa.

Libman was most surprised by one of the survey's findings that 30 per cent of Quebecers think the province would remain a part of Canada under "sovereignty."

Libman said the time has come for minorities and anglophones to stop feeling intimidated and to speak out "unequivocally" in support of Canadian unity. They also have to fight the notion, as put forward by Bloc Quebecois leader Lucien Bouchard and Parti Quebecois leader Jacques Parizeau, that sovereignty is basically a "fait accompli."

Two misconceptions that also need to be cleared up for Quebecers, Libman said, are that Ottawa would be agreeable to negotiating away the country if Quebec votes for sovereignty, and that the U.S. would automatically negotiate its own free trade deal with a separate Quebec.

Libman was also not prepared to write off the role Prime Minister Jean Chretien could play in the build-up to the referendum.

"Chretien is more popular in Quebec," Libman said, "than the academics and media give him credit for."

On another point, Libman said PQ Outremont riding candidate Salomon Cohen was "very misinformed" when he suggested recently that the Jewish community's younger anglophone and Sephardi components seem more open to Quebec's "affirmation."

Cohen, who made the comments in the May 12 issue of the French-language daily Le Devoir, was perhaps merely speaking "off the top of his head," Libman offered.

But in Libman's view, francophone Jews are "just as federalist as the Ashkenazi community," if less concerned over linguistic issues.

Two days before speaking at the synagogue, Libman issued a public statement reacting to a confidential poll Canadian Jewish Congress released to Le Devoir as a response to Cohen.

The poll, a four-year-old survey of 352 Jews conducted by the Toronto-based Goldfarb firm, buttressed Congress' position that the Jewish community as a whole remains overwhelmingly federalist, regardless of age or linguistic or ethnic origin.

But one of the findings that also reflected this sentiment — and which Le Devoir used for its May 13 headline — was that one-third of those Jews polled said they would leave Quebec if the province separated.

Libman said in his statement that, "This study should give nationalists across Quebec a glimpse of how ethnic and linguistic minorities would react to Quebec secession.

"Despite the fact that this has been a reality since 1976, the exodus has slowed.

"Should Quebec declare its independence, the floodgates will open again."

Deaf Jews plan first-ever Canadian conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Deaf Jews from across North America will have an opportunity to network and address issues of mutual concern at an upcoming conference at the Sheraton Centre Hotel on Queen Street West.

The 20th Biennial Convention of the National Congress of Jewish Deaf (NCJD), which is being held for the first time in Canada, will run from August 7 to 14. Over 300 people are expected to attend.

NCJD's only Canadian affiliate group, the 200-member Toronto Jewish Association of the Deaf (TJAD), is hosting the event. The Canadian Deaf Jewish community outside Toronto numbers less than 50, it is estimated.

The NCJD was established in New York City in 1956 to foster Jewish identity and knowledge among the Jewish Deaf. The congress has a dozen affiliate groups, as well as individual members who are not served by a local affiliate.

Karyn Goldstein, program coordinator for the convention, would like to see hearing people at the programs, she told The CJN. "Anyone who is interested in learning about the Deaf Jewish culture is welcome," she said.

Workshop topics will include: Growing Up Jewishly with Deaf Parents; Adopting Deaf Children; Are Jewish Deaf People a Separate Culture?; Legal Rights; Deaf Rabbis; Deaf Teachers; and Homosexuality in the Deaf Jewish Community in the 1990s. Interpreters will be provided for all workshops, which will be held on August 10 and 11 during the day.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut

Karen Mock

Speakers will include Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights; Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Temple Solel, Mississauga; Wisconson family therapists Eva Dicker and David Dropkin; Tovah Wax of the National Technical Institute of the Deaf at Rochester Institute of Technology; and Rabbi Douglas Goldhamer of Chicago.

Keynote speaker for the convention will be Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, on the evening of August 11.

Young adults and senior citizens will have meetings of their respective special interest groups, to be held after the workshops. There will also be a special interest group for rabbis, interpreters, parents, teachers and educators.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, will be the official convention rabbi, and will officiate at Saturday morning services as well as at the Friday night dinner. The Saturday morning service will feature a choir which will sign in rhythm. "It's quite beautiful," Rabbi Goldstein said. "I'm looking forward to that."

A choice of tours to local tourist attractions will be offered. Social events will include a grand ball as well as a performance by deaf magician Pierre Petit, and the variety show One in Many, by a group of Deaf Ontarians.

Combination tickets for the convention include admittance to all workshops and speakers, a Wednesday night reception, Friday night dinner, Saturday lunch, and the Saturday night Grand Ball. All included meals are kosher. The cost for combination tickets is $215 for members, $255 for non-members (reduced rates for ages 17 and under).

Tickets for the workshops only are $60 per person; for the keynote address only, $25 per person.

More sponsors are being sought for the convention, said Martyn Wayne, convention chair. Currently about half a dozen B'nai Brith lodges, including his own, are sponsors, he said. Wayne belongs to the Leonard Mayzel Ontario lodge, of which he is the only Deaf member.

"It will be an exciting convention," says Goldstein. "We hope it will be the best NCJD convention ever."

Victoria couple recognized as Righteous Gentiles

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Syrt Wolters of Victoria, who with his late wife Lucinda hid a Jewish family in their home in Nazi-occupied Holland, was recognized by the Israel government as a Righteous Among the Nations at a ceremony at Victoria's Congregation Emanu-El May 12.

The presentation of a medal and certificate of honor was made by Itzhak Shelef, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

The Commission for the Designation of the Righteous of Yad Vashem discovered that the Wolters hid the Spanier family — parents and two sons in their '20s — in their Enschede home from Jan. 4, 1943 until liberation of their city in April 1945.

The Wolters also employed a young Jewish woman, Frida Jacobs, to take care of their own children. With the cooperation of the local pastor, Jacobs was able to pass as a Christian.

Shelef said the names of Syrt and Lucinda Wolters will be inscribed on the Honor Wall of the Righteous at Yad Vashem — the highest Israeli symbol of gratitude and appreciation.

Wolters, who operated a barber shop in Holland, emigrated with his wife to British Columbia in July 1948.

The Wolters had a motto on their dining room wall which read: "Als wij doen wat we kunnen, zal God doen wat we niet kunnen." (If we do what we can do, then God will do what we are not able to do.)

Wolters has written an autobiography stretching from the day the Nazis marched in on May 10, 1940, until the time he left for Canada after selling his barbershop.

He said the Dutch Christians recognized before the German people did the "demonic character" of the Nazis. The Germans, he says, saw Hitler as a savior, sent from God. But a Dutch underground resistance developed quickly, and Wolters joined.

Wolters described how he and his wife took in the prosperous Spanier family when the Nazis began rounding up Jews and hid them in their modest home — quite different from the luxurious place the Spaniers had lived in.

Lucinda had to scrounge food coupons to feed their Jewish friends and the Wolters lost their health insurance coverage because Syrt refused to fill in a form that his family was of "pure stock" with no Jewish blood. When he developed an ear infection a friendly doctor cured him.

Syrt Wolters

Wolters wrote in his autobiography that the Spaniers came out of their hiding place after the 8 p.m. curfew. The two families then joined for conversation and whatever fun they could have.

Wolters said the Spaniers brought a considerable amount of cash with them and were able to pay their way while being sheltered.

The honoree was given a long, standing ovation at the presentation ceremony. More than 400 people jammed the synagogue for the event — one of the largest attendances ever at a synagogue affair.

Wolters seemed overwhelmed and said nothing was further from his mind than recognition when he and his wife took in the Spaniers. It was something he felt had to be done and he did it. He said the secret was kept so well that even his own young children didn't know there were Jews hidden in the house, although "they probably suspected something was going on."

Frida Sera, a granddaughter of the senior Spaniers and daughter of one of the sons who had been hidden, came in specially from Holland to thank the man who had saved her family. She quoted the passage from the Talmud which says that one who saves one person saves the whole world. She was born after the war, and said she always wanted to know the people who had risked their lives to save the family.

The ceremony opened with the singing of three national anthems — O Canada, Hatikvah and the Dutch anthem. Rev. Henry Jonker of First Christian Reformed Church of Victoria gave the benediction.

LaRouche, Farrakhan allies?

By LARRY KANTER
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — The Nation of Islam and followers of right-wing conspiracy theorist Lyndon LaRouche have united in an "unholy alliance" to attack Jews and Jewish organizations, according to a report released this week by the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

"After years of disagreement, the two groups have joined together to blame the world's ugliest problems on international conspiracies involving Jews," the ADL alleges in a report titled Partners in Bigotry: The LaRouche Cult and the Nation of Islam.

At "joint programs and street demonstrations, they have vilified Jews and the ADL for allegedly fostering the AIDS epidemic, promoting drugs and violence, and 'attacking' black leaders," the report charges.

The surprising ties between the two organizations, which began in late 1992, are in contrast to the mid-1980s. Then, the LaRouche organization — composed mainly of middle-class whites — called for the arrest and prosecution of Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan for his alleged involvement in terrorism.

The LaRouche group also had long-standing ties to South African intelligence services, the report claims.

The Nation of Islam, for its part, has exhibited nothing but mistrust and disdain for nearly all white, as well as many mainstream black, institutions.

But according to Mira Boland, author of the report and director of fact-finding for the ADL's office in Washington, D.C., LaRouche and Farrakhan "have a great deal in common in terms of their anti-Semitism, their demagogy, their conspiratorial mindsets and their outreach to terrorists and extremists.

"They are, if you will, 'bigots of a feather.' "

What brought the two groups together, Boland contends, was an affinity for bizarre conspiracy theories, particularly ones involving Jews and Jewish organizations.

LaRouche, for example, has called the ADL "a front for organized crime and some of the worst racists on the planet," "a bunch of racist thugs who push drugs," and "a bunch of self-hating anti-Semites with Jewish names, eager to do any dirty deed that their controllers demand."

Louis Farrakhan

Lyndon LaRouche

And Farrakhan has risen to national notoriety, largely by accusing Jews of masterminding the African slave trade and controlling the American mass media and Federal Reserve Bank.

Both groups, says the ADL, also endorse the notorious anti-Semitic czarist forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion; echo the classic blood libel that the Jews killed Jesus; and promote Holocaust denial activities.

The LaRouche organization and the Nation of Islam first united in the late 1980s to conduct two forums on the AIDS epidemic. LaRouche has long held that HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, was created in a U.S. biological warfare laboratory. And Nation of Islam leaders have accused doctors, especially Jewish ones, of injecting African-American babies with the virus.

"This is a concept the Nation of Islam picked up from LaRouche and made specificaly its own," said Boland.

Nereida Cordero Thompson, a spokesperson at LaRouche's national headquarters, refused to comment on the ADL report.

"We can't comment on something we haven't read," she said.

The Chicago-based Nation of Islam could not be reached for comment.

At the moment, ties between the two groups appear to be largely informal, consisting primarily of co-sponsored programs and lectures, including several held recently at a number of East Coast universities.

Last month, for example, the two organizations sponsored a pair of events at Howard University in Washington, and at Morgan State University in Baltimore, titled "The Ugly Truth About the ADL."

According to the ADL's report, LaRouche representatives declared at those events that the "ADL is behind drugs, destruction of children and AIDS." And a Nation of Islam spokesperson stated, "We are at war. Who's fighting us? The ADL. Either we overcome them or they overcome us, until they kill all of us or we them ... We must fight them until we crush them."

The two groups also have cooperated on a series of programs titled "Is the Anti-Defamation League the new Ku Klux Klan?"

"Neither LaRouche nor the Nation of Islam is attacking ADL only," Boland asserted. "They are attacking us because we are a symbol of the American Jewish community."

The connection has begun to manifest itself locally. At last week's Oakland appearance by Nation of Islam spokesperson Khalid Abdul Muhammad, about half a dozen white LaRouche supporters circulated among the crowd, distributing anti-ADL literature to people waiting to get into the auditorium.

"We were not endorsing his speech; nor were we criticizing his speech," said Robert Ingraham, a Democratic challenger for a U.S. Congress seat who is running on the nationwide "LaRouche was Right" slate.

"We were there to get out our literature to people who are interested, particularly our material about the ADL."

Ingraham declined to comment on alleged links between LaRouche and the Nation of Islam detailed in the ADL report. He said he was troubled by "the extent to which (Muhammad) attacks Jews."

However, he added, "I believe some of Louis Farrakhan's statements have been misreported. He has in fact distinguished between the Jewish people and the ADL."

Quebec to admit Jewish emigres

Ciaccia stressed more than once that the goal of the program is for the "integration" — not "assimilation" — of the immigrants into the "pluralism" of the province.

He said immigrants "bring [to Quebec] a richness of cultural and spiritual values. We have much to learn from all communities...Pluralism means putting a commonality of interests at work in a peaceful and harmonious way."

To mark the signing, the Jewish community brought forward several spokesmen — including Federation CJA vice-president Yoine Goldstein and JIAS' Kiaizadeh — to laud the initiative and to testify to its success.

The speakers also included two immigrants from the first batch: Sophia Cohen, from Ukraine, and 11-year-old Alexander Teshler, a student at Ecole Maimonide.

Cohen, showing off newly-acquired (if still rudimentary) French skills, arrived in Montreal nine months ago with her husband, Yakov, and said the period of adjustment has been difficult.

But Cohen is full of optimism about living "a free life in a free country." Her husband, after losing his first job shortly after arriving, has found new employment, and her child will be going to Jewish school next year.

Cohen also praised the "Famille a Famille" program, which brings together local and immigrant families to help them adapt to Montreal and community life.

Teshler, who attends a "classe d'acceuil" at the Ecole Maimonide, came to Montreal around the same time as Cohen, and his French is already approaching fluency.

He thanked JIAS for "giving a chance to me and my family."

Moss, speaking to The CJN, said the critical path for the second project will get into gear June 21, when a public meeting is held at JIAS to present details of the program.

Most of the applicants to be considered, he indicated, will involve cases of "family reunification."

However, he did not think the initiative in Quebec conflicted with Israel's expressed desire to have Jews from the CIS move to the Jewish state, not the Diaspora.

The number coming to Montreal amounts to a "drop in the bucket" compared to the total number of CIS Jews seeking to leave, he said.

Ciaccia said to his knowledge, none of the Jews from the 72 families who have come to Montreal as a result of the first accord have moved on to other provinces.

Family reunification

Joint commission to examine allegations of desecration

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A joint Israeli-Palestinian commission will investigate allegations made by settlers and yeshivah students that Palestinian police desecrated the ancient synagogue in the West Bank town of Jericho.

Last week, National Religious Party Knesset member Hanan Porat said he would sleep in the synagogue to prevent "further desecrations."

Porat's vow came after settlers and students said that Palestinian police had ripped a mezuzah from a door at the synagogue and torn the ornamental curtain covering the Holy Ark.

The Palestinian police in turn claimed that six armed students came to the synagogue and attempted to fly an Israeli flag from the roof.

They said that the students had ignored a police request to put aside their weapons.

Under the terms of the autonomy accord, settlers are allowed to visit the synagogue at any time. But the Palestinian police want them to be unarmed.

While there are no Jewish settlers living in Jericho, Israeli students have attempted to keep the synagogue in the news on an almost daily basis following the May 13 Israeli hand-over to Palestinian control of a 24-square-mile area that forms the newly autonomous Jericho district.

The students previously alleged that Palestinian police had moved their equipment into the synagogue and hung a photograph of Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat alongside the Holy Ark.

In an address to the Labor Party's Knesset faction last week, Police Minister Moshe Shahal stated that he supported Palestinian demands to disarm Israelis wanting to pray or study at the ancient synagogue.

Shahal criticized the yeshivah students for allegedly insulting the Palestinian police officer guarding the building.

"The students must not treat the [Palestinian] police as if they did not exist," he said. "That is a provocation. They are human beings, just like us."

Jericho residents celebrate transition

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — When Israel handed over control of a 24-square-mile area surrounding Jericho to Palestinian authorities on May 13, residents of the West Bank town were jubilant.

The move brought an end to 27 years of Israeli administration of the area.

But within two days the celebrants had a head-on confrontation with the realities of the region, when Israeli settlers marched on the ancient synagogue in Jericho and vowed that the Israeli flag would soon fly over the building again.

Despite the festivities, few if any municipal services were available in Jericho, and local leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) said the problems with services would not be resolved until PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat finished providing the list of officials who would take charge there.

Arafat's problems with forming the 24-member Palestinian Authority were highlighted over the weekend, when one of the people he had named to the governing body, former Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi, turned down the offer to be part of the body that will oversee Palestinian affairs in Jericho and the Gaza Strip.

Ashrawi, who resigned from the PLO's Washington negotiating team last December, said over the weekend, "My order of priorities dictates that I stay with the independent Palestinian Committee for Civil Rights to which I was recently elected."

But it is widely believed that her refusal is a protest against what is seen as a preference Arafat is giving to PLO personnel at the organization's Tunis headquarters over local Palestinian leaders when naming those who will be part of the Palestinian Authority.

The day of the transfer of responsibilities to the Palestinians, was a day of wild rejoicing among the residents of Jericho.

PLO flags were run up flagpoles where the blue-and-white Israeli flag had flown only hours earlier. Women ululated noisily with tears of joy coursing down their faces.

Youngsters who had thrown stones at Israeli soldiers walked among the ranks of the newly installed force of 400 Palestinian police and enthusiastically kissed the cheeks of the men who will have the responsibility of maintaining law and order in the streets of Jericho.

The only note of discord occurred when a Palestinian boy, playing with the rifle of a policeman, accidentally shot and killed his brother and wounded two other people.

Brig.-Gen. Haj Ismail, Jericho's new police chief, later said the policeman had been arrested for violating an order that ammunition clips be removed from the rifles during the celebrations.

Saeb Erekat, a former Palestinian negotiator who was a newly named member of the Palestinian Authority, later said that there would be no leniency for the police officer.

"We must prove to the Israelis that we can take care of our affairs," he said.

Within two days, there was further tension in the air, when Israeli settlers marched on Jericho's ancient synagogue.

They arrived on the same day that a contingent of journalists, who had been barred from the town in the days preceding the hand-over, were allowed to visit Jericho.

The settlers, many armed with Uzi submachine guns, arrived at the synagogue under the leadership of Hanan Porat, a Knesset member representing the National Religious Party, who is a prominent settler activist.

"We are horrified," said Porat, "to find that Palestinian police have put their equipment in the building and hung a photograph of PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat alongside the Ark of the Law."

"The Israeli flag will yet fly again here," Yehuda Ernest, the head of a yeshivah housed in the synagogue, vowed as he stood just three or four yards from a Palestinian policeman. "This is a Jewish place, acknowledged as such even in the agreement, and the flag ought to be up there."

Asked why he and his fellows had arrived armed, Ernest explained: "In this so-called peace, they station terrorists as if to protect us, until one day, when they decide, the whole thing will blow up in our faces. Anyway, they are only behaving properly today because you, the press, are here."

The troubles involved in implementing the autonomy agreement became obvious some minutes later when the commander of the police at the synagogue ran over to his superior officer to check whether it was in order for the settlers to be armed.

The Palestinian officer and his Israeli counterpart, out together on a joint patrol, soon agreed that this was permitted under the terms of the Gaza-Jericho agreement signed earlier this month.

In Gaza meanwhile, civil administration of the area was handed over to the Palestinians on May 15.

That day, a contingent of 400 Palestinian police arrived and the Israel Defence Force (IDF) began its withdrawal from the centre of the strip, the southern area having been handed over two days earlier.

The evacuation of each installation was a low-profile affair, with no advance notice leaking out as the IDF sought to avoid any conflict with the local population.

On May 14, the IDF withdrew from Gaza's Jabalya refugee camp, the site of seething discontent where the intifadah, or Palestinian uprising, began more than six years ago.

The IDF turned over three installations around the refugee camp to 100 Palestinian police before dawn broke on May 14.

Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilnai, the top Israeli commander in Gaza, had few regrets about leaving the region when he spoke with reporters over the weekend.

"I spent five years here," the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot quoted him as saying. "It is completely evident to me that we have to leave, and I am happy to be doing it."

IDF completes Gaza withdrawal

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The IDF completed its withdrawal from the area of Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip before dawn on May 18, but the operation did not go as smoothly as planned.

Hundreds of youths who had been waiting for the troops to leave the governor's mansion in the town centre began shouting slogans and throwing stones. Some shouted "Rabin go home" in Hebrew.

Troops fired tear gas to disperse the demonstrators, while Palestinian police who were rushed in fired in the air. Some eyewitnesses said they fired partly to keep order and partly to share in the jubilation that the last soldiers were leaving.

Army sources said the shooting lasted for over 30 minutes. "I think the Palestinian policemen used up all the ammunition they were issued," said one senior officer.

The Israel Defence Force (IDF) had previously managed to withdraw peacefully, partly because it successfully avoided revealing which locations it was going to leave when, then left in the middle of the night. In this case, subterfuge was not possible.

Brig.-Gen. Doron Almog, commanding officer in Gaza, said the overall evacuation went smoothly, "thanks to the most efficient and professional work of all units involved."

Other installations were evacuated late the previous night and very early the same morning.

"I thank the two sides and wish good luck to both of us. We have a great mission to accomplish," Brig.-Gen. Yomtov Samia, who headed the committee which established the timetable for the transfer, told a group of Israeli and Palestinian generals at the informal dawn hand-over."

Polish hero named an honorary Israeli

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Fifty-two years after he alerted world leaders to the horrors of the Holocaust, Jan Karski was made an honorary citizen of Israel.

It is the first time Israel's embassy here has bestowed the honor.

"If one can find solace in glimmers of humanity ... he was a glimmer," Ambassador Itamar Rabinovich said of Karski, during an emotion-filled ceremony at the embassy last Thursday night.

"This is the proudest and most meaningful day in my life," Karski said in accepting the plaque. "Through the honorary citizenship of the State of Israel, I have reached the spiritual source of my Christian faith. In a way, I also became a part of the Jewish community."

Born Jan Kozielewski in Lodz, Poland, Karski joined the Polish underground after the German occupation in 1939. A Catholic, he twice slipped into the Warsaw Ghetto, and, disguised as a Ukrainian guard, into the Izbica "feeder camp" of the Belzec concentration camp, in order to investigate the condition of the Jews in Poland.

Jan Karski

"What is unprecedented is that no one else that I've ever found went to a concentration camp voluntarily to observe the extermination machinery in action," Tom Wood, a journalist who has just completed a biography on Karski, said after the ceremony.

Karski describes his mission in the Warsaw Ghetto at length in Claude Landsman's epic movie, Shoah.

In 1942, Karski reported his findings to the Polish government-in-exile in London and raised the matter with members of Winston Churchill's cabinet and with President Franklin Roosevelt directly.

However, Karski's appeals for action in behalf of the doomed Jews of Europe were ignored.

"You represent the condition of the messenger whose message has been received but not accepted," Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel wrote Karski in a telegram read during the three-hour tribute.

Karski visited Israel once, when Yad Vashem conferred Righteous Among the Nations status on him in 1982.

It was only earlier that year that Karski's heroism became public knowledge. According to those familiar with his life, Karski has repeatedly understated his heroism.

Avi Granot, Israel's counselor for interreligious affairs, said later that Karski had requested that last week's presentation be kept to 20 people (more than 100 religious and community leaders attended) and had sought to pay for refreshments before the embassy insisted otherwise.

"You are larger than life, Jan Karski," stated one of the evening's speakers, Miles Lerman, chair of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council. "You have brought honor to your country, dignity to your people. You have restored faith to your church. Polish history will present you as a role model, and this is the highest reward."

And then Lerman approached the lean, frail 80-year-old in the front row, kissed him twice on each cheek and patted him gently on the face.

Haldeman book describes Nixon's anti-Semitism

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Recently-published diaries of H.R. Haldeman, the late U.S. President Richard Nixon's chief of staff, shed new light on Nixon's anti-Semitism.

At one point, Haldeman wrote that Nixon believed in "total Jewish domination of the media."

The question of Nixon's views about Jews has come to the fore in recent weeks following the former president's recent death. The American Jewish community has long been split over whether Nixon held anti-Semitic views.

The Haldeman Diaries, published last week by G.P. Putnam's Sons, buttress the argument of those who feel Nixon was anti-Semitic.

Haldeman, who died last year, was Nixon's chief of staff until the Watergate scandal prompted the president to dismiss him.

His book draws from tape recordings and Haldeman's daily diary entries.

One entry reveals evidence of Nixon's penchant for conspiracy theories, and his dislike of both Jews and the media.

"There was considerable discussion of the terrible problem arising from the total Jewish domination of the media and agreement that this is something that would have to be dealt with," Haldeman wrote.

And in an entry dated Feb. 26, 1970, Haldeman said that Nixon had "really raged against United States Jews," and had ordered Haldeman "not to let any Jews see him about the Middle East."

Richard Nixon

The conversation took place in the presence of Nixon's then-national security adviser, Henry Kissinger, who is Jewish.

According to the entries, Nixon allowed Rev. Billy Graham, his close friend and spiritual adviser, to lecture about "satanic Jews."

"Graham has the strong feeling that there are satanic Jews and that's where our problem arises," the book is quoted as stating.

The Anti-Defamation League was quick to respond to the new revelations this week.

"What Haldeman wrote about Nixon shows something that many of us felt for a long time," said Ken Jacobson, ADL's director of international affairs.

Jacobson said that Nixon was a "great man in history" who was helpful to Israel, but that he had a "singular flaw — his anti-Semitism and his bigotry beyond anti-Semitism."

The diaries also cited several racist remarks by Nixon, including a remark that "the whole problem is really the blacks."

The remarks revealed in Haldeman's diary represent the "dark side of Nixon," and are a "reconfirmation of something we've seen" before, Jacobson said. He called the remarks "extremely distressing."

Nixon's views about Jews have always proved paradoxical.

On the one hand, he hired a number of Jews as key advisers, including Kissinger, who served as secretary of state after his stint as national security adviser. And Nixon was viewed by most as a strong supporter of Israel.

But it was well known in the American Jewish community that Nixon voiced derogatory attitudes about Jews during his now-infamous White House taping sessions.

Israel to host month of events for gay men, lesbians

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — For the first time ever, Israel will play host to a month-long series of events for and about gay men and lesbians.

Although most of the activities related to Gay Pride Month will take place in Tel Aviv, the opening ceremony is scheduled for May 30 at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem. The ceremony, the first of its kind in Israel, will honor the memory of homosexuals murdered in the Holocaust.

In early June, thousands of Israelis are expected to attend the World Congress of Gay and Lesbian Jewish Organizations, which is meeting here this year. Participants will discuss such issues as ensuring the legal rights of homosexuals, and the dearth of local advertising directed toward gay and lesbian consumers.

Other events will include a picnic for gay and lesbian parents and their children, and a giant food festival, hosted by Tel Aviv's most acclaimed chefs.

According to gay rights activists, the introduction of Gay Pride Month to Israel represents a victory for homosexual Israelis, many of whom have remained "in the closet" in the fear of encountering discrimination and harassment.

Ilan Shinfeld, spokesman of the Society for the Protection of Personal Rights for Gay Men, Lesbians and Bisexuals, said that Gay Pride Month is only one of many recent breakthroughs for gay men and lesbians in Israel.

Shinfeld believes that "societal attitudes have changed a lot in the past two years, especially in the area of education.

"About a year ago," he recalled, "I wanted to visit high schools and discuss what it means to be homosexual. I sent dozens of letters to schools, but received only two positive responses."

Noting that the Education Ministry recently announced its intention to introduce the subject of homosexuality into the high school curriculum, Shinfeld said, "It's incredible what has taken place in just one year.

"Education is very important," he added. "Without education, public opinion toward homosexuals will continue to be negative, regardless of what the law says."

Gay rights activists also point to progress in the legal sphere. Under the guidance of Knesset member Yael Dayan of the left-wing Meretz bloc, the Knesset recently passed a law forbidding discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

Another sign of progress was the Tourism Ministry's decision last month to give a $500 grant to the World Congress of Gay and Lesbian Jewish Organizations.

The moves marks the first time a government body has contributed funds to an organization dedicated to gay causes.

Orly Doron, spokeswoman for the Tourism Ministry, does not consider the grant unusual.

"The Ministry of Tourism has an interest in attracting all kinds of tourists to Israel," she said. "We support other kinds of conventions, so why not this one?"

Aderette Karni, an organizer of Gay Pride Month, attributes these strides to a greater openness within the gay and lesbian communities. "Society is changing because we're changing," she said.

Despite progress, gay activists say that Israeli society still discriminates against lesbians and gay men, especially in the synagogue and workplace.

Karni, who co-founded a gay-lesbian synagogue in Tel Aviv, Ga'avat Yisrael, said that it is "very difficult to be religious and gay, especially in Jerusalem."

A minyan comprised of lesbians and gay men also meets quietly once a month in Jerusalem.

But asked whether she could imagine establishing an openly gay and lesbian synagogue here, Karni said, "I wouldn't try it. The haredim (ultra-Orthodox) would be very against it."

Out of the Closet: Gay men and lesbians in Israel are making strides. For one, the armed services continue to draft homosexuals and June will mark the first-ever Gay Pride Month. [IPPA Photo]

Argentina plans to track Nazis

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Argentine President Carlos Menem has told a group of Jewish leaders that the country will establish a special agency to track down Nazis who found refuge there after World War II.

Ruben Beraja, president of the DAIA, the umbrella body of Argentine Jewish groups, and Manuel Tenenbaum, head of the Latin American Jewish Congress, recently met with Menem and his staff to discuss such a plan after police arrested former SS Captain Nazi Erich Priebke in an Andean resort town.

Priebke was found in San Carlos de Bariloche, a haven for Nazis, and interviewed there by ABC Television for a recent broadcast of its program Prime Time Live.

Priebke admitted in the interview to having taken part in the reprisal massacre of 335 Romans at the Ardeatine Caves in March 1944. Since that broadcast, Italy has initiated extradition proceedings for Priebke.

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress in New York, said Menem pledged to extradite Priebke as soon as the appropriate documentation is received from Italy.

He also agreed, according to Steinberg, to set up a centre that will not only look at the files on Nazis who found refuge in Argentina, but use the files to track down other Nazis who may be alive in Argentina.

The government's files on Nazis were closed to the public until Menem opened them for the first time in 1992.

Even with the files opened, however, "there was no active effort to seek out those who were alive in Argentina and seek to bring them to justice," Steinberg said.

The new agency will reportedly become part of either the foreign or interior ministries.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

SCHARTUP

A letter from Ann Houpt, of Toronto, enquiring about the surname Schartup launched me onto a frenzied research expedition which led nowhere.

I ruled out the usual sources — toponymic (place name), occupational and descriptive and the Slavic word for devil, Czart, with which no one would choose to identify.

I zeroed in on acronymic names, but the closest I could find was Sharlat — *Sh*alom *R*av, *L'*ohavay *T*rahtecha — "a great peace to those who love Thy law" (Psalms 119-165).

I even considered it might be an emasculated version of Schwartzkopf, the name of the American general of Gulf War fame, which literally means "black head," but I rejected that as involving too much surgery. As a last resort, I considered the possibility it came from the Jewish word Scheuer Topf — scouring pot — but that's taking pot luck.

Hebron observer force says IDF interfering

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The international observer force in Hebron has complained that the Israel Defence Force (IDF) is keeping its 120 members under virtual curfew, despite its mandate to patrol the city.

A delegation which went to the IDF's military headquarters in Hebron on May 18 reported that the army was "very reluctant" to let them move about in Hebron during the curfew imposed after the killing of two settlers near Beit Haggai, south of Hebron.

"We got nothing from that meeting," said Bjarno Sorensen, spokesman for the Temporary International Presence in Hebron (TIPH). "They closed the total city because of the killing of two Israelis, but that was outside Hebron. Why should that incident prevent us from moving around?"

The IDF said in response that the "TIPH is free to move in and out of the city."

The army said a pre-notification of the impending curfew was faxed to TIPH headquarters, "as is required from us according to TIPH's mandate." TIPH confirmed receipt of the fax, but protested the scope of the curfew.

In Copenhagen, Danish Foreign Minister Niels Helveg Petersen said Denmark, a participant in the force, was considering lodging an official protest as well.

Italy's PM defends decision to put neo-fascists in cabinet

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Italy's new prime minister, Silvio Berlusconi, recently defended his decision to include neo-fascists in his cabinet, rejecting international concern expressed over the issue.

Berlusconi charged those criticizing his new cabinet with "bad faith" and said they were spreading a campaign of "disinformation."

Berlusconi's 25-member cabinet was sworn in May 11, as part of Italy's 53rd government since World War II.

Five of its 25 ministers are members of the National Alliance, the far right-wing movement at whose core is the Italian Social Movement, a party that was formed after the war by supporters of defeated fascist dictator Benito Mussolini.

The day after Berlusconi's defence, however, the speaker of the Italian Senate said he could understand European concern over the issue.

Speaker Carlo Scogniamiglio blamed neo-fascist leader Gianfranco Fini for helping fuel the controversy, particularly with his remark last month calling Mussolini "the greatest statesman of the century."

"It was an inopportune remark which had a very negative effect on public opinion," Scogniamiglio told a news conference. "To recall one name can have more of an impact than 100 speeches."

Scogniamiglio, who is a member of Berlusconi's Forza Italia party but holds a position that puts him above party politics, said the National Alliance, though right-wing, was not neo-fascist per se.

But, he added, "nobody can pretend not to know that it derives from the (Italian Social Movement), which in turn has its roots in the fascist experience.

"In Italy, we know the representatives of the National Alliance well, and we know they have nothing to do with fascism. But outside Italy memories of what fascism was remain," he said.

Viewed from outside, he said, "It is understandable that there is deep concern" — particularly since there are extreme right-wing movements in other European countries that do resemble true fascism.

In his first interview as prime minister, Berlusconi — a billionaire tycoon whose wide-ranging business interests include the media, retailing and construction — told state-run RAI television last week that his government was fully committed to democracy.

"All Italians can be absolutely sure that what they have before them is a government that believes in the fundamental principles" of freedom, democracy, respect and tolerance for others, he said.

He said National Alliance members he knew "have nothing to do with a distant past, to put it clearly, with fascism. They are so far from fascism that they can be considered anti-fascists," he said.

National Alliance leader Gianfranco Fini, who for years led the Italian Social Movement, has tried to rid his party of its jackboot image.

"The Berlusconi government marks the end of the first republic and the ideological ostracism of the right," Fini, 42, said. "We have reached an objective. Some people believed that speaking of the right in government was a vain illusion. Tonight, Italians acknowledge that this is not so."

Fascism was "finished in 1945," he repeated the next day, but he has so far failed to repudiate fascist ideology.

European leaders who have expressed concern at the inclusion of neo-fascists in the Italian government included French President Francois Mitterrand and Belgian Foreign Minister Willy Claes.

Mitterrand expressed "regret" over the inclusion of the neo-fascists. And Claes termed them "people who tend to neutralize human memory and who do not seem to have a democratic concept of Europe."

The News in Brief

CoL Rises Sharply

TEL AVIV — An unexpectedly large increase in the cost-of-living index for April has left Israeli ministers scrambling to find ways to clamp down on spiraling costs in a sector largely responsible for the increase — housing.

The two per cent rise in April's cost-of-living index was described by Jacob Frenkel, governor of the Bank of Israel, as "extremely worrisome."

The announcement spurred Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to summon his housing and finance ministers and their senior aides to an emergency meeting last week.

Soaring increases in home-purchase costs and in monthly rentals accounted for a full 40 per cent of the April rise.

Israel, U.S. Sign Jet Deal

JERUSALEM — The United States and Israel have signed a deal for the St. Louis, Mo.-based McDonnell Douglas company to produce 21 F-15I Eagle fighter jets for Israel's Air Force.

The decision to purchase the F-15I, a version of the U.S. Air Force's F-15E, was made last January, following a year-long evaluation process that included consideration of the Lockheed F-16ES, a jet tailor-designed for Israel. The Israel Air Force (IAF) finally decided to purchase the all-weather, day/night, long-range F-15I.

The deal is worth about $2 billion (U.S.) and Israel will have the option of buying up to four more jets. The first planes will be delivered by 1997.

Congress to Monitor PLO's Compliance

WASHINGTON — Members of both houses of the United States Congress have announced they are forming committees to monitor Israeli and PLO compliance with the self-rule accord.

A bipartisan House of Representatives committee established earlier this month — the Peace Accord Monitoring Group — will work to ensure the PLO observes its pledge both to refrain from and condemn terrorism.

The House group is worried Washington's five-year, $500 million grant to the Palestinian autonomy body will flow regardless of PLO compliance.

Under a recent bill, the State Department must report to Congress on PLO compliance with its commitments to Israel.

But some in Congress doubt that the State Department will accurately evaluate the PLO's behavior, and for that reason decided to establish the new group.

Thumbs Up For Breyer

WASHINGTON — Jewish groups have reacted enthusiastically to President Bill Clinton's nomination of Judge Stephen Breyer to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Organizations said they like Breyer's reputation as a middle-of-the-road jurist and skilled coalition-builder. But they caution that there is little public knowledge of where the judge stands on such issues of importance to the Jewish community as church-state separation, freedom of religion, abortion rights and civil rights.

Jewish officials said they will have to wait for next month's Senate confirmation hearings to learn more about Breyer's philosophy.

If confirmed, Breyer would be the second Jew to serve on the court. (Ruth Bader Ginsburg was confirmed last year).

Two Jewish justices serving simultaneously on the U.S. Supreme Court has not occurred in more than 50 years.

Police Seize Liquid Cocaine

TEL AVIV — Narcotics detectives here last week seized liquefied cocaine disguised as Colombian coffee liqueur, worth around $700,000, allegedly smuggled from Colombia.

Tel Aviv narcotics detectives at Ben Gurion Airport arrested a 30-year-old suspected courier, who possessed six bottles of what officials thought were Colombian liqueur and a large bottle of Colombian port.

But instead of liqueur, the bottles contained seven kilos and 300 grams of liquefied Colombian cocaine.

Firm Caught Making PLO Flags

JERUSALEM — A subsidiary of the Jewish Agency for Israel has been manufacturing flags for the PLO, The Jerusalem Post reported last week.

The company, located in Nahariya, produces disposable paper products. It recently received an order for car deodorizers in the shape of 28 different flags.

One of the flags was the PLO insignia, but the company director did not recognize it. The person who placed the order, an Israeli entrepreneur, did not stipulate which flags he was ordering.

The company manufactured several hundred PLO flags before a local journalist spotted one.

The firm ordered an immediate halt to the production and a thorough investigation of the matter.

"This is a scandal," said company manager Hanan Ben-Yehuda. "It is not feasible that the Jewish Agency, which more than any other body symbolizes Zionist values and the return of the Jewish people to its homeland, should be the framework for the production of PLO flags."

Paul Shulman Dies

JERUSALEM — Paul Shulman, the U.S. Navy officer who went on to become the first commander of the Israel Navy, died May 16 at age 72.

Shulman, a New York City native, graduated from naval officers' school in Minneapolis. He went on to become a executive officer of a destroyer in World War II and left the U.S. Navy in 1945.

He immediately joined the effort to smuggle Jewish refugees and arms from Europe as part of the struggle against the British and the Arabs.

In November 1948, Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion asked Shulman, then 26, to set up and command Israel's fledgling navy.

In his nine months in the job, Shulman laid the ground for today's navy. He also commanded two important actions at the end of the War of Independence: the blockade of the Gaza Strip and the capture of Ein Gedi, securing Israel's hold of the Dead Sea's southwestern coast.

Skinheads on the March

ROME — A rally last weekend by hundreds of skinheads — officially permitted by authorities in the northern city of Vicenza — has prompted a chorus of outrage and protest.

Italian Police Chief Vincenzo Parisi, who said he had not been informed in advance of the rally, responded by issuing nationwide orders that no skinhead rallies would be permitted anywhere in Italy in the future.

Attending the rally were between 200 and 300 skinheads and right-wing extremists from a number of Italian cities. They marched through Vicenza giving the Nazi salute, carrying banners, chanting pro-fascist, anti-foreigner slogans and displaying swastikas.

The march and the ensuing protests came amid alarm already raised by the inclusion of five ministers from the neo-fascist National Alliance in the new government of Prime Minister Berlusconi.

Herzog was elected at the WHO assembly meetings in Geneva earlier this month.

Weidman Schneider to Speak

WINNIPEG — Susan Weidman Schneider, founder of Lilith Magazine, will be the guest speaker when the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba (JFM) launches its new Women's Endowment Fund on Thursday, June 2 at the Centennial Concert Hall.

Schneider was invited to speak because the idea for the fund was planted in a speech the former Winnipegger gave last summer to the Winnipeg Jewish community's Combined Jewish Appeal executive, according to Leslie Wilder, a member of the Women's Fund committee.

The fund is intended to support and highlight issues important to women, Wilder said.

"There will be no restrictions," she said. "This may fund family and community issues, health matters and educational programs of interest to women."

Rabin is laying groundwork for Syria agreement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Is Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin preparing his fellow citizens for a momentous Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for a peace treaty with Syria?

It would appear so.

By means of fairly forthright statements and calculated leaks to the media, the Israeli government seems to be laying the psychological groundwork for an eventual agreement that would commit Israel to a phased pullout from the disputed Golan.

The signals have been sharp and clear.

Last month, on the eve of U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher's visit to the Middle East, Rabin declared that he was willing to uproot Jewish settlements in the territories, including the Golan, in return for a genuine peace accord.

As he put it in a meeting with members of the United Kibbutz Movement: "To me, peace is a more important value for the security and future of Israel than this or that group of settlements. Let's once and for all put things in a context that corresponds to the new reality of a great and strong country, not a country on the eve of the (1948) War of Independence, when we had to hold onto every settlement."

At around the same time, Rabin told a Knesset committee that the Israel Defence Forces' conception of withdrawal on the Golan fell short of current "political reality."

And earlier this month, Rabin warned that an impasse in Israel's negotiations with Syria would not be in Israel's interests.

A stalemate, he said, could result in a formidable alliance embracing Syria, Iran and Iraq. "And in five to 10 years time that could lead to war, which will be fought with missiles and perhaps non-conventional weapons as well," he added in a sombre aside

Communications Minister Shulamit Aloni, who's far more dovish than Rabin, has also been dropping broad hints. Speaking on Israel Radio recently, she advised Israelis "to start getting used to the idea that Israel will have to totally withdraw from the Golan."

Stories planted in newspapers and magazines, presumbly by advocates of a withdrawal, have heated up the increasingly acrimonious national debate over the future of the Golan.

Ha'aretz, the Tel Aviv daily, has reported that Israel's Foreign Ministry is drafting a detailed blueprint for peace with Syria, based on a total Israeli evacuation.

As well, Ha'aretz claims that Gen. Ehud Barak, the chief of staff, has privately informed American diplomats that any deal with Syria would be based on a full withdrawal.

The report is not far-fetched. Last year, in a briefing for foreign correspondents, Barak's deputy, Gen. Amnon Shahak, intimated that Israel's security could be safeguarded without the Golan.

All this suggests that Israel's Golan policy is changing, or has already changed.

Until quite recently, the consensus in Israel was that the Golan, captured from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War, was absolutely vital to Israel's defence.

In December 1981, the Likud government effectively annexed it. And as late as two years ago, when Rabin was running for election, he ruled out anything more than cosmetic territorial compromises on the Golan.

So what has happened? In all likelihood, Rabin — and certainly the more accommodating foreign minister, Shimon Peres — have reached the conclusion that the peace process cannot proceed without Syria.

By virtue of being Israel's most formidable military foe and a powerful arbiter in Arab politics, Syria commands leverage over Lebanon and Jordan. From experience, Israel has learned that neither Lebanon nor Jordan will sign a peace treaty with Israel without Syria's approval.

The problems between Lebanon and Israel are not insurmountable. As Rabin has said more than once, Israel has no territorial claims on Lebanon. He is prepared to give up Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon if the newly reconstituted Lebanese army disarms Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Islamic fundamentalist group which has shelled Israeli towns and killed scores of Israeli soldiers since the 1982 Lebanon War.

But, as everyone knows, the Syrian-beholden Lebanese government cannot act unilaterally. Syria — whose army still occupies considerable swaths of Lebanon, in contravention of the 1989 Taif agreement — can veto any Israeli-Lebanese agreement. Syria did so in May 1983, defying Israel and the United States, and can do so again.

Lebanon's timidity was again displayed last February. In response to U.S. pressure, Lebanon promised to calm the situation in the south by reining in Hezbollah operations against Israel. But significantly, Lebanon pointedly said that it would do so only with Syrian "cooperation."

Jordan — which shares the longest border with Israel — is theoretically prepared for a formal rapprochement with the Jewish state. In the past year, Jordan and Israel have signed an agenda for peace and protocols for economic cooperation. Furthermore, King Hussein — who has held a series of secret talks with Israeli leaders going back three decades — has said unambiguously that he would not be averse to a "warm peace" with Israel.

Nevertheless, Jordan has refrained from taking the final plunge. Indeed, after a meeting in Damascus with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad last winter, King Hussein indicated that he would "coordinate" Jordan's policy with Syria.

In plain language, this means that Jordan will not take any further initiatives with Israel unless there is substantial progress on the Syrian front.

Israel and Syria have been discussing the nature of peace since the October 1991 Madrid conference, co-sponsored by the United States and Russia.

In direct talks held in Washington, there has been some progress, but no major breakthroughs as yet.

Syria wants a complete Israeli withdrawal from the Golan, but this demand is unacceptable to Israel unless Syria signs a full-fledged peace treaty.

This frustrating impasse, which holds the key to a settlement between Israel and Syria, has yet to be broken. However, there are signs on the horizon that a solution may be in the offing.

Last year, Syria proferred a formula of "full peace for a full withdrawal." In January, following a meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton, Assad allowed that he was ready for "normal, peaceful relations" with Israel, and that peace was Syria's strategic objective.

In April, Israel sent formal proposals to Damascus with Warren Christopher. Syria rejected Israel's offer for a withdrawal in stages over five to eight years, in exchange for a Syrian commitment to make peace with Israel. But last week, with Christopher in Damascus yet again, the Syrians hinted that they might indeed accept a phased Israeli withdrawal.

If true, this would add flesh to Christopher's recent observation that negotiations have "reached a new and different substantive level."

Realizing that many Israelis are opposed to an Israeli withdrawal, even for the sake of peace, Rabin and Christopher have urged Assad to come up with confidence-building measures to assure Israelis that Syria is serious about peace.

So far, Assad has offered very little, though he has hinted that Syria's bilateral talks with Israel may be raised to the foreign minister's level.

In the meantime, the Syrians are reportedly asking Israel for a statement that the Golan rightfully belongs to Syria. Israel, in turn, wants secret talks with Syria. It will be recalled that such talks preceded Anwar Sadat's historic visit to Israel in November 1977.

Syria is clearly a tough adversary, and Israel's negotiations with Damascus will be lengthy and difficult. But if the talks do succeed, they will reinforce Israel's May 4 landmark pact with the PLO, and open the door to a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East.

We must pursue moderation, not extremism

By RABBI SIMKHA WEINTRAUB

Purim 5754 — Feb. 25, 1994 — is a day few of us will ever forget. It is indelibly etched in the minds and hearts of Israelis, Jews, Palestinians and other Arabs as the day an Israeli Jewish settler massacred Palestinian Muslims as they prayed in Hebron to the one God of us all. He chose his textual inspiration from a rarely taught passage in the Book of Esther which describes how Jews slaughtered thousands of their enemies.

But chapter 9 of the Purim story is not the model for Jewish behavior. Rather, it is the Exodus of Passover which ought to shape our actions and reactions. In that story, we learn that the newly-liberated and empowered Israelites do not resort to violence, revenge or pre-emptive attacks even after being oppressed for 400 years. They instead move toward Sinai, to receive the law that will shape their national identity, their communal quest for justice.

In this law are commandments such as, "Do not oppress the stranger, for you know the feelings of the stranger, having yourselves been strangers in the land of Egypt." (Exodus 23:9); "Do not abhor Egyptians — for you were once strangers in their land . . ." (Deuteronomy 23:8). As a liberated people, Jews were exhorted not to emulate their oppressors but to further freedom, to cherish life, to show empathy, to promote justice and to embody compassion.

And today we must continue along the same path of justice, pursuing moderation not extremism, pluralism rather than provincialism. Where the destructive portion of the Purim story represents the legacy of terror, insecurity and fear, Passover is the result of sacred law and moral principles, the confident reaching for freedom and autonomy.

The Hebron massacre, and other terrorist incidents, occur when people divide the world into "us" and "the other," painting all Arabs or all Jews as the enemy, and finding justification for massacre in fundamentalist, liberal application of the Bible or the Koran. But as reporter Laura Blumenfeld says in a recent Washington Post article, "Like studying dinosaurs, studying the Old Testament heroes has great educational value. But to revive them in a literal, fundamental sense would be to create a biblical Jurassic Park."

Even as we relive our experiences of persecution and oppression, we must reaffirm the commonality of all people. The Bible underscores that Jews and Arabs descend from the same patriarch, Abraham, who is buried in Hebron. And according to another ancient Jewish tradition, Abraham purchased the Hebron site precisely because Adam and Eve were also buried there. Abraham sought, in the words of the midrash, to unite all of humanity.

Over the centuries, Jews and Arabs have prayed side by side in Hebron — its name derives from the Hebrew word for "friendship." But too often, the tombs have become the site of enmity, suffering, oppression and even slaughter, dividing not uniting all of humanity.

May we grow to a vision of humankind's oneness, enabling Jews and Arabs to live together in tolerance, peace, equality and mutual respect in their corners of the world,

Rabbi Simkha Weintraub is the public affairs director of the New Israel Fund, a philanthropic partnership of Israelis and Diaspora Jews dedicated to strengthening democracy and promoting social justice in Israel.

Survey casts doubt on Arab readiness for peace

By HILAL KHASHAN

Reprinted with permission of the Wall Street Journal, 1994. Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All rights reserved.

There is good reason to doubt that Arab public opinion is ready for peace with Israel. Survey research I conducted among 1,000 Muslim Lebanese, Syrians and diaspora Palestinians on the eve of the signing of the September 13, 1993 agreement between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization suggests that the leaders are very far ahead of the masses when it comes to contemplating peace with Israel. This implies that Arab leaders risk delegitimizing themselves, perhaps dangerously so, if they persist with current policies.

To begin with, of the respondents who favored the peace process, not one single person gave a positive justification for peace with Israel. Respondents variously see peace as the only available alternative at the present or as a chance to recover some territory occupied by Israel since the Six Day War or as an opportunity to put a halt to "Israeli aggression."

But the most popular view sees the peace as an interim measure to enable Arabs to reorganize themselves and strike at Israel later. In all, more than 90 per cent of those who support peace say they would cease to support it if Israel were weakened in the future.

These results force us to conclude that Arabs who support the peace negotiations see them leading to a truce, not to a lasting peace.

Also revealing are the alternatives to direct negotiations that Arab respondents offer. Three-quarters of them call for immediate military confrontation against Israel. The remaining one-fourth call for maintaining the present situation of no peace, no war, pending the time when Arabs can attain their objectives. This prompts two comments. When three-quarters of the respondents look forward to war, it hardly augurs well for the cause of true peace. And when Arabs call for military action against Israel, they show themselves to be out of touch with reality. If Arabs could not destroy Israel during the peak of superpower polarity, they are unlikely to do so in a time of U.S. predominance.

From these data, I conclude that Arabs, even those who advocate it are not psychologically ready for peace. Views of Israel's long-term plans after a peace agreement bear out this conclusion.

The respondents worry most that peace will enable Israel to become the Middle East's economic superpower, followed by concerns that it will try to obtain the lion's share of the region's water resources and instigate sectarian conflict. Many Arabs charge Israel with fomenting the Lebanese civil war, compounding the Kurdish question in northern Iraq, and aggravating the rebellion in Southern Sudan. They perceive a grand Zionist scheme to create mini-states replacing Lebanon, Syria, Iraq and Egypt.

Such suspicions of Israel should be dying vestiges of the Arab-Israel conflict's early days; that they remain vibrant indicates intellectual stagnation and points to a failure to understand the complexity and dynamism of politics. The respondents, two-thirds of whom are professionals, have fallen victims to uncritical political evaluations.

This study produced sobering results. The respondents show little understanding of the meaning of peace, much less an appreciation of its possible benefits. Quite the contrary, they see peace as surrender and display attitudes that suggest that the conflict with Israel has yet a long life ahead. The survey findings point to strong anti-Israel sentiments remaining in Arab political culture.

The leadership bears considerable responsibility for this state of affairs. Since the early 1920s, it has heavily socialized the populations to suspect Jews and hate Zionists, and then to seek the destruction of the state of Israel. And when Arab leaders finally chose to take part in peace talks with Israel, they did not adequately prepare their people for what might ensue. Their "peace by stealth" consists of one step forward, two steps backward. Leaders once exaggerated the tough stance against Israel; now they underestimate the implications of peace.

Arabs today are in a state of muted rebellion, feeling abandoned by their leaders and bypassed by modernity and political liberalization. Genuine peace is not improbable, but it demands profound resocialization. Americans can help by promoting mutual interaction, cooperation and understanding so that peace eventually stands on its own. Otherwise, the quiet that prevails in the Levant these days could very well be a calm that precedes the storm.

Sanctions on Iraq

To its credit, the United Nations Security Council has once again extended economic sanctions against Iraq. After careful consideration, it has been determined that Iraq is not in compliance with resolutions passed by the UN in the wake of Iraq's brazen invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. So the 33-month-old trade embargo stands, as it should.

Iraq — ruled by dictator Saddam Hussein, who rained Scud missiles on Israel in the 1991 Gulf War — is entirely aware of what it must do to convince the UN to rescind the embargo.

•Iraq must eliminate all its threatening nuclear, chemical and biological weaponry of mass destruction. It is true, as France and Russia point out, that Iraq has taken steps in this direction. But halfway measures are clearly insufficient.

•Iraq must unequivocably abandon its territorial claim to Kuwait, a country it still covets and whose borders it has not recognized. It will be recalled that the events which triggered the Gulf War began with Iraq's incursion into and annexation of Kuwait.

•Iraq must stop promoting terrorism, yet it is loath to do so. Last year, for example, Iraqi agents tried to assassinate George Bush, the former U.S. president, in Kuwait. Last month, two Iraqi diplomats in Lebanon confessed to murdering a high-ranking Iraqi dissident, Sheik Taleb al-Suhail al-Tamimi.

•Iraq must stop repressing its people. Yet Saddam continues his remorseless campaign against the marsh Arabs of southern Iraq, while massing tens of thousands of troops for a possible assault on Kurdish strongholds in northern Iraq.

•Iraq has yet to account for numerous Kuwaitis who disappeared during its occupation of Kuwait.

The Iraqi government complains that the embargo — which exempts the import of food and medicine — is having a detrimental effect on its population. This is not a fairy tale. But embargoes are never pleasant, nor are they meant to be. If Saddam is really sincere about easing the pressure on his long-suffering people, he will comply fully with UN resolutions.

The sanctions should not be lifted until Iraq comes to its senses and complies.

Division by color

A scenario that stretches the bounds of credibility will unfold in Vancouver beginning on June 30 during a conference entitled Writing Thru Race: A Conference for First Nations Writers and Writers of Colour.

The week-long event is being sponsored by the Writers' Union of Canada and funded, in part, by the Canada Council, a federal agency which supports artists, writers and scholars. Although most of the conference will be open to the public, participation in several workshops is limited to writers of non-European descent.

The exclusion of white writers from these sessions has provoked angry commentary — pro and con — in the media and, most recently, a bitter debate at a recent forum held in Toronto by the Writer's Union to discuss the conference. According to a May 14 story by Val Ross, the Globe and Mail's publishing reporter, funding for the $15,000 conference from both public and private sources is "up in the air" as sponsors try to withdraw their support or hold up delivery of their cheques.

The Canada Council often supports conference and seminars which deal with ethnic, racial, linguistic and cultural divisions in Canada and elsewhere. However, this is the first time that it has appeared willing to support a conference whose participants are chosen not by academic or literary expertise but specifically by racial origin.

This is one of the most retrograde activities recorded in Canada's social history. The Writing Thru Race conference is wrong on several grounds. First, it invokes the spectre of racism by its exclusionary vision. Second, it encourages a segmented approach to literature and life. Third, it emphasizes the "separateness" of non-white writers by embargoeing other writers. Fourth, it sets a dangerous precedent by invoking race as a collective organizing motif: what is to stop a white supremacist group from soliciting funds from The Canada Council for a closed-door seminar on the special problems of "Canadians of European descent"?

Organizers of the conference defend it by saying that non-whites are confronted with problems whites cannot understand or share. Indeed, as one non-white Union member pointed out at the forum only one non-white has ever sat on the Canada Council board, and of 260 Council staff, only three aren't white. But his conclusion — that "until that changes you will have a need for such conferences" — is wrong.

The Vancouver conference will widen the gap and prevent the very changes he and his colleagues in the Writers' Union desire. It can only reinforce division by color in Canadian society.

The Canada Council should not be promoting such a disconcerting view of Canada, either in its hiring or its funding policies.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

PLAY WAS GENUINE

I strongly object to Ben Rose's review in The CJN, "A Shayne Maidel unbelievable" (May 5). He not only claimed that parts of the story were unbelievable, but also that "there is no solid core to the play." Is he serious? The more I read and the more I hear about surviviors, the more I am aware of how incidents during the Holocaust defy the imagination. How people survived, how they narrowly escaped death time and time again, and finally how many people found parts of their broken families after it was over.

Inside this intimate theatre, during the silences, the only sounds were those of people sobbing. Unlike Mr. Rose, the audience had no difficulty perceiving "a clear demarcation between real life and fantasy." How can Mr. Rose say that this play "is an unfortunate vehicle" or that it lacks genuine elements?

The following elements were as clear as the numbers tatooed on my survivor's arms: The guilt of the surviving sister for being alive; the guilt of the American sister who lived comfortably in New York during the war; the anguish of the father who did not rescue his wife and grandchildren from the ovens of Auschwitz; and finally the recurring nightmares and flashbacks reminding us of too many unspeakable horrors.

We all cried and cried, and yet we came away with further insights into the Holocaust, the survivors, and perhaps even ourselves. For this we are very grateful to the director, Mr. Al Waxman, the superb actors, the producer, Janese Kane, and to the writer, Barbara Lebow.

WAISEN AND SPITAL SHULS

Rabbi Gunther Plaut's article (May 5) about the synagogue in Veitshoechheim that was spared during Kristallnacht evokes memories of two synagogues located in Fürth (near Nürnberg) with which I had close associations.

One was my parents' synagogue, called Spital Shul located on the premises of the Jewish Hospital, the other called the Waisen Shul was situated in the building of the Jewish Orphanage.

Due to its close proximity to the Jewish Elementary and High School the Waisen Shul was popular with boys of bar mitzvah age to daven Mincha/Ma'ariv.

The Waisen Shul enjoyed a postwar peak in attendance thanks to a Jewish DP camp near Fürth, and also the presence of Jewish soldiers of the U.S. army in bases close by.

To-day the Waisen Shul is a full functioning house of worship serving the Jewish community.

I would be amiss not to mention the pearl of Bavarian synagogues, namely the synagogue in Ansbach, most probably the oldest synagogue in existence in Germany.

All three synagogues share a common thread, they were situated amidst and adjoining dense built-up areas. The Waisen and Spital Shul were "In-House" synagogues, located in full government accredited institutions; even the Nazis had second thoughts about torching these buildings.

STOP THE SLAUGHTER

Let me add my voice to Avrum Rosensweig's call to our Jewish leaders to decry the modern Holocaust going on now in Bosnia and Rwanda. What is the Jewish response to such horror? Do we think that since it does not involve Jews (except for the unfortunate few caught in the crossfire), it is not a "Jewish issue"? Do people think "it is only the goyim killing goyim"? Why can't the Jewish community, precisely because of our Holocaust, take the lead in organizing mass protests by religious leaders of all persuasions?

I understand the reluctance of the countries of the UN to send their own soldiers to die on behalf of other people who seem intent on killing each other. But aren't there other ways to force the combatants to stop? Can we not force an arms embargo on the entire region? If the U.S. feels that an economic embargo can force the rulers of Haiti to capitulate, why can't this be tried in Bosnia?

I admit that I am not a political or military expert. But, as Avrum Rosensweig says, we have to do more than just shake our heads sadly. If the Holocaust survivors and their children can't shame our political leaders into doing something, then it is true that we have learned nothing from our Holocaust. Even those who remember history are doomed to relive it.

SEDER AT DROP-IN CENTRE

I firmly believe that there are times in peoples' lives when by the grace of Almighty G-d they get a brief opportunity to feel the all encompassing warmth of G-d's love and compassion. I am grateful that I had such an opportunity over the Passover Holidays.

I work as a social worker in the Parkdale area of our city. One of my responsibilities is to monitor boarding homes that house people with serious mental health problems. Many of the residents in these homes know that I am an Orthodox Jew. Usually this information is met with indifference. When a resident is ill, then the indifference turns to verbal abuse. Imagine my surprise when I found a number of Jews living in these boarding houses, under such conditions. When they found out that I was a fellow Jew, a special bond developed. After some time it became clear to me that these residents need and want a closer link with the Jewish community, their heritage.

Last year, a few weeks before Chanukah, I and some of my colleagues were able to hastily arrange a Chanukah party for the residents at a drop-in centre in Parkdale. I was told that the party was a success. However, I was disappointed because only about a dozen people showed up. Some of the people were Jewish others came out of curiosity.

As Passover approached I spoke to my colleagues about a seder. After some discussion we decided to give it one more try. I asked the members of my shul (The Village Shul) for financial donations. I was overwhelmed by their generosity and support. Now, I am pleased to state that on March 29 42 people showed up at the same drop-in centre to celebrate Passover. Besides enjoying the five-course meal we were able to provide, Jews who have not participated in a seder in a very long time, read from the Haggadah both in English and Hebrew. I will never forget that pride and joy I felt as I heard people focus long enough to fully participate in the Seder.

I will cherish this Passover for the rest of my life, and I thank G-d that I was given this opportunity to see and feel his compassion and love.

What I learned when I met the Warburgs

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Recently a good friend gave me a copy of Ron Chernow's book, The Warburgs. It is a thoroughly researched volume and, even as books of this type go, quite voluminous — over 800 pages. Chernow is a well-known family biographer, having won the National Book Award for his first book, The House of Morgan.

Why do I write about this family? Because during an early part of my life I became involved with them, and the experience taught me a fundamental lesson.

Many readers will no longer remember just how prominent the Warburgs were on both sides of the ocean. They were originally German bankers, some of whom moved to the United States. Here they became partners in Kuhn, Loeb and Company, one of Wall Street's most prominent houses. They were active in Jewish life, prominent in the Joint Distribution Committee, influential in the building of Israel — and in a thousand ways made their presence felt.

At some time in 1933, just when the Nazis came to power, my father told me the Warburgs in Berlin were looking for a tutor for their son Oscar, who had recently contracted polio and needed to be taught at home. Dad had spoken to Lola, Oscar's mother, a Warburg married to prominent industrialist Rudolf Hahn. I told Dad I would be happy to take on the tutelage of the boy, but — not having had this kind of employment before — I wondered what I should charge.

Rabbi Plaut

"Well, what do you think?" he asked me. I thought for a moment and then suggested a very modest hourly rate, which would reflect my own experience.

Thereupon Dad made the following prediction: "If you charge too little, the next time you go there the butler will ask you to enter henceforth by the servants' entrance. If you charge the right amount, the butler will say 'The family would like you to join them for lunch.' " Beyond that Dad wouldn't go — he never told me what to charge.

I made the long trip to the beautiful Hahn-Warburg home in the suburbs, met the boy and found him most agreeable and his mother a most gracious lady. (Contrary to the belief that the rich and famous were all fully assimilated, Lola was quite observant.)

Oscar was a 10-year-old lovely boy, and we got along famously, with Lola watching in the wings. When we agreed that I would teach the boy nothing was said about compensation.

At the door, just when I was leaving, Lola asked me what my charge would be. I burst out with some large hourly rate and was in fact shocked that I had been so daring. The lady was not at all upset and simply said that it was fine.

On my next visit the butler met me at the door and said, "Mr. Plaut, the family wondered whether you would like to join them for lunch."

I never forgot the lesson: sell yourself cheap and people will treat you that way; if you value your own work, people are likely to treat you accordingly.

Oscar made good progress and eventually — when the family managed to leave for England — entered his father's business, but unfortunately died at a fairly young age.

When I left for the United States in 1935, the Warburgs gave me a recommendation to their cousins in New York. On my first day in the New World I called on Felix Warburg, the grand old man of the clan, in a magnificent office on Wall Street. He proved to be most accessible. After the interview, I left with a letter of recommendation to Warburg's friends in Cincinnati, where I was going to attend Hebrew Union College. His letter gave me an entree to some of the best people in my new environment.

I lost track of the family after a while. Oscar's mother Lola died not long ago and the Warburgs have faded from the limelight. But their contribution to Jewish life, as well as the larger community, is not forgotten.

Israel revisited, loved and appreciated

By HARRY RASKY

Let's talk about Israel — the new Israel.

Now that I am leaving the electric life of Israel, it is blowing my mind.

It has been 21 years since I was here, just before the 1973 war was about to erupt. Israel was a rude, cocky society. The Yom Kippur war taught this super-weapon world that total destruction was tragically possible. The sacred could become the destroyed in a matter of minute-men missile minutes.

I had been reluctant to return to Israel. My memory of 21 years ago was of an angry, rushed society, too busy building to be polite. We couldn't quite understand the fierceness of the Israelis. We were pained by it. There were no frills. It was truly an age of anxiety. El Al then was a journey of discomfort. The oppressive safety precautions, the body searches, the grilling made you feel like a prisoner of war. The country was shouting at you all the time. Israel was a constant argument and you always seemed to be the loser.

Now the intifadah is a constant on our television screen. Israel from a distance seems a festival for rock throwers. The CBC and CNN told us it was powder keg time in the Middle East and of course, the fanatic revenge bombing by a lone lunatic at the mosque in Hebron made Israel seem like a place to avoid. Why toy with fate? Why visit a nightmare?

Let me tell you, they got it all wrong. We got it all wrong.

I gave some thought to cancelling a long-planned journey to conclude filming for my new CBC epic Prophecy. The daily dose of danger in the Israeli streets that I heard about made it seem foolhardy.

Surprise!

When I checked in at El Al's direct Toronto flight, imagine my astonishment when the security force at Pearson Airport was strictly polite and even apologetic. They seemed to be saying, "Excuse me, sir, sorry to intrude, but we must ask you some questions to avoid your being blown up." The long, long but extremely comfortable flight passed with ease. Three back-to-back inflight movies reminded me of my childhood Saturday afternoon triple bills at the Royal George Cinema on St. Clair Avenue. The arrival at Ben Gurion Airport as the plane caught the early dawn light from the Mediterranean was more effortless than any landing I've had in Toronto. There was an intense feeling of normalcy.

Our Israeli guide, a tender, tough woman named Yaffa, insisted we take a detour down the old road to Jerusalem with a required stop at the Prophet Samuel's tomb. It's a deserted mosque, patrolled by young Israeli draftees looking like a high school summer camp team with machine guns instead of tennis rackets. And the Orthodox settlers with their black beards and extended families came to pay their respects to Samuel the Prophet. To be in Jerusalem is to be history's special companion.

I decided to do a quick survey of the Via Dolorosa in the Old City. I had been told by other visitors from Canada that no one goes into the Old City. But the fact is the place was packed with tourists and I found the Arab shopkeepers agreeably anxious to make a deal. Yes, the presence of the 18- and 19-year-old Israeli soldiers, looking somehow too young in their too-large uniforms, added a bizarre note. But there was no discomfort, none.

We had a brief moment of panic when Yaffa, our driver, failed to pick us up at the agreed gate of the city. She showed up an hour late. Had it been an encounter with a terrorist? No, it was a head-on collision with a camel and her sparkling new GM van seemed to have lost the fight. We never saw the camel but Yaffa assured us she got his license number.

The Hyatt Regency Hotel in East Jerusalem near the Hebrew University is like a pyramid on a hill, the service close to perfect. The fact must be known, but it is untold in our daily press ever anxious to cry out "crisis," that Israel is booming. There is a terrific sense of abundance. It is unrecognizable from the Israel of 21 years ago. An Israeli breakfast of fresh fruit and vegetables is a morning dream.

On Good Friday morning, we filmed extensively along the path where Jesus, according to tradition, walked his last mile. The maze of guns and crosses and chants amid the smoke from outdoor cooking turned the whole place into a marvellous market. Even though we were surrounded by an endless parade of Muslims returning from prayers at the Dome of the Rock, we felt oddly at ease. We felt less fuss than after a Blue Jay game in Toronto. But here shish kebab was on sale instead of Shopsy's.

On Easter Sunday morning, we drove through what are called the occupied territories to film David Courchene, a Canadian Indian prophet, who had travelled all this way to conduct a ceremony of oneness to link the four races. As the sun rose, the Dead Sea lay tranquil like a giant pool of metallic blue jelly. Across the way, was Jordan, silent. We did avoid the road to Jericho, now the frontier of independence. We talked to dark workers in a vineyard, who were somewhat afraid of the approaching day when Yasser Arafat moves in to be the new king of the Palestinians.

The journey back to Jerusalem was crowded with cars rushing back after a holiday weekend in the Dead Sea resorts, reminiscent of Highway 400 on a summer Sunday with the return of travellers from Muskoka.

Early the next day, we headed for Haifa, a magic city on a hill that should rival San Francisco for beauty. But boom times have turned it into a polluted place. It is a city absolutely void of any tension. Arab and Jew have figured it out here. A visit with the matriarch from Montreal, Mrs. Maxwell-Rabbani, reminds you of an earlier time. The Bahai Temple is beautiful in the Mediterranean light as the disco music drifts down from Ben Gurion Street.

I happened to be in Haifa for Holocaust Remembrance Day. The sad sirens sound at 11 a.m. All traffic freezes. It is time to remember. But who can forget here in the country populated by the survivors and those who followed. But after the traditional two minutes of bowed heads, the city shouts it is time to be normal. At a service that night, at Yad Vashem it is declared that no name must be forgotten.

Of course, the news tells us that a terrorist has blown himself up in a bus, but life goes on, driven by powerful forces that say we will be normal, we are used to it.

Yes, there are political stabbings, but there are no muggings, no rapes to report and few robberies. At the Weizman Institute, against the background of the Koffler Reactor, the president, Chaim Harari, talks of a time when sea water will be purified. Along the way we pass settlements for Russians, settlements for Ethiopians and fields of flowers.

The Western Wall. Why should a mass of stones make you weep? But it does. It is time for Bar Mitzvah ceremonies with young men from New Jersey and Montreal and Morocco, conquerors at the age of 13, riding on the shoulders of proud fathers reciting in cracked tones the ancient prayers, reading from the Scrolls of the Law as if Moses himself were listening. Who is to say he is not? We left notes in the cracks in the Wall. God had many letters that day. "Dear God, please . . ."

I had a magic meeting with Nathan Sharansky, the man who defied the entire Soviet Union and won. For him, a modern prophet, it is Russia that is unsafe and Israel, the promise to come.

I went down by plane to Eilat, a Miami on the Red Sea. The hotels are more ornate than anything I have seen, matching the shocking colors of the coral life just outside the hotel entrance. Tourists have come from France and Scandinavia on direct flights. Even though Egypt is just a few yards away, there is zero sense of danger.

The debate in Conrad Black's conservative Jerusalem Post is about importing foreign workers to replace the stone throwers in Gaza. There is a shortage of workers.

Tel Aviv is a city removed from the danger zone. The highway to the city is jammed with industry.

Finally, we are on the way to the airport; the orange blossoms sweetly scent the air — the promise of a new season.

It's said that every man lives in two cities. One is his own, the other is Jerusalem. I am home.

Doing someone's laundry a real act of love

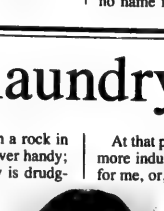
By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

If someone should mention an Act of Love, some people's minds (not yours or mine, for Heaven's sake) may immediately conjure up prurient images. That depends on what you perceive as an Act of Love.

If you think Acts of Love happen only in the dark and between spouses, you're wrong. If you think Acts of Love involve locked doors and dark rooms, you're still wrong . . . at least, about the Act of Love on my mind — doing the laundry.

It may not sound romantic, but love is the only reason (short of cold, hard cash) that any human being would ever do any other human being's laundry. Doing laundry is what used to be called in the South "stoop labor," in that you have to stoop to do it; bend, lift, tote, sort, wash, bend, lift, tote, sort, dry, bend, lift, tote, sort and, worst of all, fold. In the words of Fiddler on the Roof, "If that's not love, what is?"

Now, I'm not complaining unduly. After all, I don't have to beat the blue jeans on a rock in the river (actually, we don't have a river handy; would the Atlantic do?), but laundry is drudgery, even with the help of a washer and dryer, and doing drudgery on behalf of another person is an Act of Love.



Erica Meyer Rauzin

I have limited domestic skills, mostly involving food. Laundry is not a big ticket area for me. I dread it. I let it pile up, pushing against the lid of the hamper, overflowing the baskets in the children's closets, until doing it is no longer an option, but a necessity. When our 4-year-old complains that he is out of Ninja underpants and Barney socks, when I have to wash and dry school uniform shirts during breakfast so that my daughters can leave the house, when my husband is forced to wear the T-shirt with his college seal on it under his best white shirt for synagogue, it's time for the laundry hustle.

At that point I have two choices: pay someone more industrious and competent to manage this for me, or, in the words of the 17th-century play . . . stoop to conquer. So, I gather it all up and head for the machines.

I think enviously of a friend of mine who assigned everyone in her household a color: each person's towels, sheets, toothbrush, hairbrush and plastic laundry basket is that person's color. If the green and red laundry baskets appear in the laundry room, the clothes in them get washed, dried, and folded. Then the green and red persons are expected to fetch them and put away their clean clothes. If the blue laundry basket fails to appear, the blue person lives with dirty socks. I think this is an admirable system. It might work in the army, but it wouldn't work at my house.

The baskets might make it to the laundry room (at least, the first time) but they'd never make it back to the bedrooms, at least not if the junior owners were held truly accountable. Why? Because the only thing worse than sorting, washing, drying, toting, and folding is putting away. I can imagine my children living out of their laundry baskets, like someone in hotel room where there's no space to unpack, but I can't imagine them putting clothes away.

Perhaps I do them an injustice: they do set the table, feed the dogs, bring in the newspapers and give desultory attention to the garden, but I believe they think that clean clothes, like dollars, grow on trees. They don't know that loving labor refills their closets with pressed, fresh clothes. I think they believe in the laundry fairy, who comes mysteriously while they are in school, scoops up the dirty clothes and replaces them.

Actually, a laundry fairy would be a lot help. I wonder, if you rub on a lamp to get a genie, what do you rub to get a laundry fairy? What the hey, hand me the Clorox bottle, and we'll give it a try.

Polish mystery exposed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

To Henry (Henryk) Grynberg, it was the ultimate mystery.

Grynberg, a Holocaust survivor from Poland, had always been puzzled about the circumstances surrounding the deaths of his father and younger brother during the war.

Were they murdered? And if so, by whom?

These questions consumed Grynberg, an actor-turned writer and poet, before and after his emigration from Poland in 1967.

Three years ago, while visiting Paris, he finally got the chance to unravel the conundrum. A young Polish film director, Pawel Lozinski, approached Grynberg and asked whether he'd be interested in participating in a film he was planning.

It would be a documentary about a Polish Jew, like Grynberg, who returns to Poland after a long absence and looks up old family acquaintances. Lozinski chose Grynberg because he was familiar with his writings, which have an avid following in Poland. In fact, Lozinski had made a student film based on one of Grynberg's short stories, and the movie had won first prize in a French film festival.

Initially, Grynberg greeted Lozinski's offer skeptically. But upon further reflection, he changed his mind. Such a film, he reasoned, would enable him to confirm, once and for all, the fate that had befallen his father, Abram, and his brother, Baruch.

In February 1992, Grynberg and Lozinski's crew set out for the village of Radoszyna, 60 kilometres east of Warsaw, where his father had been a dairy contractor.

Lozinski's 47-minute documentary is called Birthplace, and is in Polish with English subtitles. It had its Canadian premiere earlier this month at the second annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

An award-winning production, Birthplace was previously shown at festivals in Poland, Denmark, the United States and France.

It opens as a Polish airliner lands in Warsaw, then fades to a scene in which Grynberg pensively looks out a car window at a desolate winter landscape in rural Poland. The rest of Birthplace turns on Grynberg's conversations with wrinkled, bent peasants who knew his parents, including his mother Sophia (Sarah), prior to the war.

These encounters, which are laden with bitter memories of the Holocaust, reveal that Baruch, only 18 months old at the time, was shot by a German policeman in 1942, and that Abram was murdered by two Polish brothers in March 1944, and buried in a pit in the vicinity of Radoszyna.

The most powerful segments in Birthplace occur when the phlegmatic Grynberg confronts the deceased killer's younger brother and then, horrifically, finds his father's mummified remains in a grave.

But Birthplace, more than just a riveting murder mystery tinged with intimations of the Holocaust, is an insightful examination of the wide range of attitudes displayed by Poles toward Jews.

Grynberg, a resident of McLean, Virgina, a virtual suburb of Washington, D.C., was born in Warsaw in 1936. He was raised in Radoszyna — where the Grynbergs were the only Jews in a staunchly Catholic population of about 100 — and educated in Lodz.

Several years after Nazi Germany's invasion and occupation of Poland, news reached the Grynbergs that their deportation was imminent. "We were supposed to be transported to Treblinka, but we ran away," said Grynberg in an interview in his Toronto hotel room.

With their flight, the Grynbergs became furtive, frightened fugitives, hiding in fields and forests and farmers' barns and backrooms, always paying for their lodging and food. In return for a substantial payment, Sophia left Baruch with peasants.

Having been about six years old when he and his family fled Radoszyna, Grynberg has few recollections about those harrowing years when he was constantly on the move and in hiding.

He can, however, vividly recall the fatigue, the lice and the hunger, to which he adjusted. He also remembers "the resignation and joylessness" of his life. "Sometimes," he admitted, "I was suicidal."

Grynberg is grateful for the help his family received, but he has no illusions. Most farmers who assisted Jews, he said, were not necessarily kind and decent. More often than not, they sought "material gain." Others delivered Jews to the Germans in exchange for money or supplies.

Knowing that theirs was a precarious existence, in which their lives always hung in the balance, Sophia made her way to Warsaw and, somehow, obtained forged documents for herself and Henryk. Abram did not join them in Warsaw, probably because he realized he could not "pass" as a Pole. And for this reason, he perished ignominiously.

After the liberation of Poland by the Soviet army, Sophia placed Grynberg in a succession of Jewish children's homes and sanatoriums to restore his health. There, he regained his Jewish identity, which he had been forced "to forget" during the war. "I realized it was all right to be a Jew."

After their ordeal, the Grynbergs had no interest in remaining in Poland. Not long after the war, Sophia and her new husband applied for, and were granted, exit visas for Venezuela. Before they could leave, Grynberg's stepfather was arrested and packed off to a labor camp.

In 1957, Sophia and her husband finally left, immigrating to Israel. Since Grynberg was completing his studies at Warsaw University, he stayed behind. Three years later, Grynberg's parents settled in the United States. In 1968 Grynberg's stepfather was killed in a liquor store holdup in Los Angeles. Sophia passed away in 1979.

In the wake of the 1967 Six Day War, Grynberg — a member of Ida Kaminska's renowned Yiddish theatre troupe — defected to the United States.

The Polish government had just launched an anti-Zionist campaign, and Grynberg feared that his personal and professional life would be thrown into turmoil if he went back to Poland.

"I would have suffered emotionally as a Jew, and I doubt whether I could have functioned as a Jewish writer."

Today, Grynberg has 20 published books of prose, poetry and essays to his credit. He writes in Polish, but has been translated into English, Hebrew, French, German, Dutch and Italian. His themes revolve around the war, the post-Holocaust syndrome and the nature of Jewish identity.

After settling in the United States, Grynberg juggled his writing with a two-decade career at the United States Information Agency as a Polish language broadcaster and editor.

Grynberg, who has two grown children, considers himself "a Polish writer" who's spiritually Jewish. "It's a little bit complicated, but there's really not much to it."

Last year, he returned to Poland on a second visit to deliver lectures on his work to Warsaw University students.

"Poland is still the country of my culture, and it's important to me," he said. "But I can't imagine living there "

Henry (Henryk) Grynberg in a scene from Birthplace, which was screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Steven Spielberg's critically acclaimed film, Schindler's List, is not only a box office hit, but a stunning blow to Holocaust deniers.

Neither Spielberg nor the powers-that-be at Universal Studios thought it would be a commercial success. In fact, Universal's chairman, Tom Pollock, even tried to talk Spielberg out of it.

But Spielberg, the most successful director in Hollywood, was determined to bring Thomas Keneally's best-seller to the big screen because, as he explained recently, American high school history texbooks have either ignored the Holocaust or reduced it to a fleeting footnote.

Spielberg cared about the Holocaust because he was raised in a Jewish environment and had lost relatives during the war. For him, it was not just an abstraction. "I've been preparing for this film all my life," he said.

By all accounts, he convinced Pollock to embrace the film because of his tremendous clout in the $5 billion-a-year industry. Spielberg's movies, ranging from Jaws to E.T. The Extra Terrestrial, are among the top-grossing films of all time, and therefore, Pollock deferred to his judgment.

Schindler's List was made for $23 million, a relatively modest sum these days. To Spielberg's surprise, the film has been hugely profitable, having raked in some $90 million to date. Now Universal predicts that its international gross could exceed $200 million, which would place it on a par with such stratospheric instant classics as Jurassic Park (a Spielberg production) and Mrs. Doubtfire.

Since its release last December, Schindler's List, which won seven Academy Awards and a clutch of other accolades, has been seen by more than 100 million people world-wide.

An immense success

It has done remarkably well in Europe, particularly in Germany. The German foreign minister, Klaus Kinkel, has said it has "hit Germany like a time bomb, but in the positive sense." The film has also drawn large crowds in Japan and South America, and is scheduled to open in Russia in June.

Schindler's List has run into turbulence in the Muslim world. In March, Malaysia announced it would ban the movie on the grounds that it was anti-German "propaganda" and reflected "the privilege and virtues of a certain race only." But following overseas protests, Malaysia relented, saying it would allow Schindler's List to be screened. The film, however, will not be shown in Malaysia because the censor there demanded cuts Spielberg roundly rejected.

Schindler's List is banned in Syria, Jordan and other Arab countries. The Damascus newspaper, Al Ba'ath, has attacked it as an attempt to divert attention from Israeli "aggression." Jordan's minister of information said he decided to ban it after the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre perpetrated by Baruch Goldstein.

Not unexpectedly, the film has generated interest in the Holocaust. A new edition of Keneally's book currently tops the charts, while an audio version, read by one of the movie's actors, Ben Kingsley, occupies an exalted position on the Publishers Weekly audio list. And there are spinoffs. In April, the cable TV Family Channel began showing Holocaust, the 1978 miniseries which won eight Emmys and first exposed a mass audience to the Nazi genocide.

In addition, the state of California has introduced a Holocaust education program which integrates Schindler's List into the curriculum. Twenty five other states have expressed an interest in what is being called the Schindler's List Project.

Spielberg himself, in recent weeks, has given a series of talks to high school students across the United States. His topic — religious and racial hatred.

Schindler's List has caught Holocaust deniers off-guard, but they have launched a countercharge. In this country, for example, the racist Canadian Liberty Net's telephone message describes the film as "a masterpiece of propaganda."

A handful of ignorant, gullible souls may buy this line. But most people will rightly reject it as neo-Nazi ranting.

For Holocaust deniers, Schindler's List is an unmitigated disaster. Spielberg has struck a blow for truth.

Curiosa and trivia

By CARL ALPERT

There is still no end to the curiosa and unusual but distinctive trivia which make life here so interesting. For example:

Fat is Not Beautiful. A new criterion for promotion has been introduced in the Israel armed forces. The regulation stipulates that officers who are found to be overweight will not be advanced in rank. Weighing-in will take place annually, and those found to be carrying surplus fat may even be subject to fines.

Treated with Kid Gloves. There is a law on Israel's books making it a criminal offence to offer financial or other material inducements to encourage a person to change his faith. Nevertheless, for the past 12 years, the police have refrained from prosecuting all such complaints brought to their attention.

Where They Come From. Since the establishment of Israel in 1948, this country has received 2,034,000 immigrants. Countries of origin, in order of numbers: The former Soviet Union, Romania, Morocco, Poland, Iraq, Iran, the U.S., Turkey and Tunisia.

To Test Equal Rights. An Israeli who considers returning home after a lengthy stay abroad is offered certain rights and incentives to encourage him to come back. Observers are now waiting for a test case where an Israeli Arab, returning to the country, makes application for the rights and benefits of a returnee.

Forbidden to be Himself. A local Tirat Hacarmel artist who went out for a walk one evening was arrested for impertinence to a policeman and for falsely identifying himself as Leonardo da Vinci. The Israeli, an immigrant from Mexico, was cleared when it was revealed that was indeed his name. To avoid further difficulties he has now changed it to Aryeh Golan — but he is still engaged professionally in painting, sculpture, architecture, literature and poetry.

New Source of Income for Kibbutz. City folks are invited to spend a day on the farm and see what the real thing is like. Sample of the attractions: For 12 shekels, milk a cow with your own hands.

A Real Pro. A Canadian tourist was apprehended by the police for stealing property from shops to a value of hundreds of thousands of dollars. While being arraigned at Jaffa police headquarters, he managed to pocket equipment from the desk of the police sergeant. The charge: kleptomania.

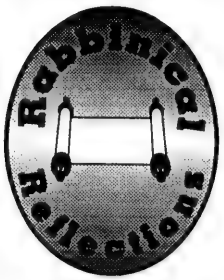
Long Memory. Israel's beer manufacturers sponsor advertising on Israel's radio stations — except on Abie Nathan's Voice of Peace, despite its popularity among young people. The reason, it is said, is that for some years Abie broadcast a jingle 17 times a day, calling on his listeners to drink water — water — water!

Plus ca Change . . . "In Samaria, he charged up a hill, in the face of a volley of stones; he fired into the crowd of men who threw them . . ." From Innocents Abroad, by Mark Twain, 1867.

Pithy Politics. Abba Eban, expressing his opinion of the two leaders of the Labor party: "One is unpleasant, the other is unbearable."

Pigs and Proselytes. In combating the law to forbid the raising of pigs in Israel, some members of kibbutz Mizra, whose major industry is processing the porkers, have threatened to convert to Christianity.

Only in Israel. Journalist Tom Friedman of the New York Times recounts that the daughter of the Israel poet, Yehuda Amichai, came wailing to her father: "Daddy! My ball fell into Herod's Tomb!"



By RABBI KENNETH KATZ

Sex is a delicate subject for sermons. In many congregations, people may feel it is inappropriate for the rabbi to speak about that topic. And yet the Bible, the Talmud and the great medieval rabbis speak about sex frankly and often.

In a world where public discussion and display of sex is a constant in entertainment, the press, advertising — a few blocks from my shul in Montreal, there is an enormous billboard with a jeans ad that would have been considered pornographic not many years ago — it seems to me it is a rabbi's responsibility to speak occasionally about sex in the Jewish tradition. Better to hear about it in shul than on street corners.

And so the Rabbinical Assembly of Conservative Judaism has established a commission on human sexuality to produce what it calls a Jewish pastoral letter on human sexuality. A draft was presented at the Rabbinical Assembly convention in April, and I would like to share a few highlights with you.

The letter discusses four topics: the general values which pervade the Jewish tradition that bear upon sexual relations; Jewish norms for marital heterosexual sex; heterosexual sex outside the bonds of marriage (pre- and post-marital); and homosexuality. Readers can obtain more information on this letter from their Conservative rabbi.

Also recommended is the recent book, Does God Belong in the Bedroom?, by Rabbi Michael Gold. In particular, teenagers and their parents may be surprised and pleased that they can receive intelligent and sympathetic guidance from Judaism and their rabbi on the difficult topic of sex.

Why a religious view of sex at all? Let me quote the pastoral letter:

"Contemporary Jews all too often think of sex as a distinct area of life, separate from the rest of what we think, feel, and do. Thinking about sex like that, however, dehumanizes and mechanizes sex: sex becomes simply the functioning of a machine with no meaning beyond the immediate pleasures it affords.

"One of the critical lessons of the Jewish vision of life is that sex is not a physical activity exclusively. God created each one of us as an integrated whole, with no part of us capable of living apart from any other part of us. The body, the mind, the emotions, the will and the spirit are all involved, at least to some degree, in everything we do in life, and they affect each other continuously and pervasively.

"This integrated view of the human being has an immediate implication for our sexual activities — namely, that our sexual acts ought to reflect our values. Our sexual relations should be shaped by who we are as people; they should express our whole selves, who we are and who we want to be. Sex should not be seen as a series of isolated acts with no effect on the rest of our lives; it should rather be seen in the broader, more accurate way in which Judaism depicts it — as one important part of our human existence which is tied to all the other parts and which therefore affects, and is affected by, the totality of our lives.

"This means that some of the norms which we generally apply to other parts of our lives are at least as important in our sexual relationships. This should not be surprising. Sex, after all, is one of the ways through which we relate to one another. Emotionally and physically, it is a particularly intense way, of course, but that only means that the expectations we have of each other in other contexts are all the more important in sex. Consequently, much of what we learn in other forms of relationship applies to sex as well."

Some of the Jewish values mentioned in the letter are modesty, respect for others, honesty, love and fidelity, health and safety, all of which taken together can make sex part of human relationships which bring one closer to God.

"Sex, in other words, can be a vehicle for celebration, for wholeness, and for holiness."

In its discussion of marital sex, the letter emphasizes the traditional Jewish values of companionship, the Jewish home, raising and educating Jewish children, and notes that the Jewish birth rate in North America is leading to a decline in the Jewish population.

The letter reaffirms the importance of the laws of family purity, and speaks in detail about contraceptive methods, abortion and infertility. At the same time, it speaks sympathetically of the reality of divorce and single parenthood.

In a controversial section, the letter discusses at length premarital and postmarital sexual relations. Jewish tradition condemns extramarital sex (sex with someone other than one's married spouse). It also condemns casual and promiscuous sexual encounters since they involve little or no love or commitment.

But the letter nevertheless realizes, as was well known in the Biblical, Talmudic and Medieval tradition, that there are valid and compelling situations where people may engage in longstanding but informally arranged emotional relationships that if close and lasting, may validly include a sexual component. However, the letter goes on to emphasize that here, too, as in marital relations, the same Jewish values must be affirmed as inside a marriage, even if not as well.

The statements on homosexuality reflect an ongoing debate, still unresolved, between the traditional condemnation of homosexual relations and the demands of our changing understanding of homosexuality.

In this column I have only touched on the topics raised in the letter. Whatever you may think about the details, I share the hope of the Rabbinical Assembly that, by raising the topic of sexuality in a Jewish context, the pastoral letter will be another way to demonstrate the continuing relevance of our tradition.

For more details, see your rabbi.

Hearings for Haitians urged

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Jewish groups in the United States are pressing the Clinton Administration to proceed speedily with its plan to grant asylum hearings to Haitian refugees.

Sixteen national and local Jewish organizations issued a joint statement recently calling the administration's recent decision not to repatriate immediately refugees picked up by the U.S. Coast Guard an "encouraging move."

But Jewish activists say they will be watching closely to ensure that refugees receive due process, including legal representation and fair hearings to determine their status.

Sponsors of the May 10 statement include the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, the American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, Council of Jewish Federations and B'nai B'rith.

Refugees from Haiti have been fleeing to the Florida coast on makeshift sailboats, rafts and dinghies since a military junta overthrew Haiti's first democratically elected president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, in September 1991.

Of the nearly 45,000 who have been interdicted by American officials since then, fewer than 3,000 received asylum hearings, and only approximately 600 were granted asylum.

Okanagan Jewish community praised as Negev Dinner held

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — The first Negev Dinner ever organized by a small community was held here May 10.

The Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) is "an outstanding example of what can be accomplished when people share a common goal, vision or purpose," said Cliff Serwa, MLA for Okanagan West.

Serwa and his wife Lois were the honorees at the dinner, the proceeds of which will establish an Okanagan grove in the Jewish National Fund's British Columbia forest in Israel.

More than 300 people filled the dining room of the Capri Hotel for the occasion. About 20 Vancouverites joined the historic Kelowna event.

Mel Kotler, a past president of OJC and a member of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) Pacific region board of directors, said the dinner "is a great mitzvah. There are no two finer people in the Okanagan that we can think of to honor with this dinner. Cliff and Lois are wonderful humanitarians, community minded citizens and good friends to all who know them."

Serwa said he remembers the first time he was invited to attend an OJC function — "perhaps two handfuls of people in a small hotel. They were individuals who were dedicated and committed, but perhaps hesitant about becoming too visible. Yet, as time passed, these same people became stronger and I knew they were on their way when they filled the Kelowna Theatre (300 plus) with members from the larger community to watch the Shalom Dancers perform."

The OJC became active fundraisers and the members soon achieved their first dream — a Jewish community centre, Serwa continued. "They are still fundraising for projects directed to special interests such as the Okanagan forest in Israel, and as well have made financial contributions to local organizations and societies."

Canada, said the MLA, is a multicultural country "and it is my conviction that the best way to eliminate racial and religious prejudices is for minority groups to become part of the larger community. Hence understanding and familiarity are developed." He said members of the OJC have made "a dedicated effort to present themselves in a positive way — I am proud to be considered a friend."

Keynote speaker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Itzhak Shelef, added his praise of the Okanagan community. "This evening," he said, "is a testament to the resolve, willpower, effort and sheer determination of the Jewish community in the Okanagan."

Potential for achievement

The potential for achievement, said the ambassador, is not relative to size. Rather, the potential for achievement is relative to will.

Shelef said the sanctity of the democratic process and of democratic values is something that Israel shares with Canada. He said Israel's dedication to upholding democratic ideals "is quite remarkable" given that it is the only democracy on earth which has never experienced a day of formal peace since its birth.

The ambassador said Israel must defend its democracy and at the same time defend the civil liberties against those who would bring it down. It is a tense situation "with which we will be forced to live until the day we have true and lasting peace in the region with all our neighbors."

He noted that Israel and the PLO signed an agreement finalizing arrangements for the transfer of authority of Jericho and Gaza but "this is not the end of the process — only the beginning."

He said much remains to be done in the Middle East and in specific countries, bilaterally and multilaterally. Canada, he added, and the rest of the world's democracies "have an important role to play in helping us achieve the true and lasting peace."

Ambassador Shelef joined in paying tribute to the honorees, Cliff and Lois Serwa, "a couple well-known for being activists, philanthropists, idealists, realists, altruistic, pragmatists and leaders in their community."

Former Social Credit cabinet member Grace McCarthy and Okanagan and Victoria radio station owner Mel Cooper were among the special dinner guests. Present also was Gideon Shavit, JNF emissary from Israel to British Columbia; Norman Gold, JNF Pacific region president; Anita Nadler, OJC president; Bob Levin, OJC past president; and Dr. Alvin Lander, JNF Pacific region director.

A feature of the evening was a silent auction, with items donated by Kelowna merchants and business people and items from Israel.

* * *

In further news from Kelowna, the OJC recently held a Shabbat dinner honoring the conversion of Larry Teal to Judaism. The dinner was held at the Jewish Community Centre. According to the OJC, Teal and his family "have become completely integrated into the Okanagan Community and have proven to be most dedicated, committed and productive participants in the ongoing development of the OJC." Mel Kotler, speaking on behalf of the community, extended a mazel tov to the Teal family. A kiddush followed the service.

Mormons said to be 'baptizing' Shoah victims

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Esther Ramon, president of the Israel Genealogy Society, was startled recently to learn that her grandfather, a religious Jew who had been slaughtered in the Holocaust, has been posthumously baptized by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), otherwise known as the Mormons.

Ramon made the discovery during the international conference on Jewish genealogy, held in Jerusalem in early May; she had been consulting the Mormons' International Genealogical Index (IGI), a vast computerized repository of names of some two billion deceased persons. Compiled for the purpose of assisting family tree research, the IGI shows the full name of each individual, and provides information on birth, marriage and death dates; other family members; and whether the Mormon Temple baptismal ritual has been performed.

Immediately after seeing her grandfather's name, Ramon spoke with Gary Mokotoff, president of the Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies. "She was very upset. She wanted to know, 'How can I get him unbaptized?' " Mokotoff recalls.

"She couldn't understand how anyone can take a man who was a religious Jew all his life, and who was murdered for being a Jew, and baptize him. To my knowledge, once somebody's been baptized, there's no way to get the church to unbaptize him."

It has been almost a year since Mokotoff first became aware that some Mormons in the Salt Lake City region were extracting names from the Gedenkbuch, a listing of 128,000 German Jews murdered in the Holocaust, and performing a religious ordinance in their local temples to baptize and endow them according to the Mormon religion.

In a letter of complaint to J. Richard Clarke, a church elder, Mokotoff explained that the practice "shows incredible insensitivity to the anguish of living relatives of these martyrs, some of whom saw their loved ones murdered ... Baptism is a Christian ceremony that ... reminds us of the centuries of persecution against Jews where our ancestors were given a choice: be baptized or suffer death."

Mokotoff closed his letter with a dire prediction: "At present, this practice is known to only a few Jewish-American genealogists who noticed the entries in the International Genealogical Index. Once the Jewish world community is aware of the practice, it will seriously strain relations between Mormons and Jews."

Although the LDS Church does not officially support the practice, it claims it cannot prevent zealous church adherents from performing the ritual on deceased Jews. "Please be aware that, given the nature of computer databases and the number of temples and family history centres operational throughout the world, we cannot guarantee that no work will be done," Clarke replied in a letter to Mokotoff.

The exchange was reprinted in full in the Spring 1994 issue of Avotaynu, the International Review of Jewish Genealogy, of which Mokotoff is publisher. Publication of the letters has seemingly generated an Associated Press wire story and a flurry of electronic comments on the Internet computer network.

The AP news story explains that LDS church members would like to baptize everyone, not just deceased Jews. "It is a labor of love," church spokesman Thomas Daniels is quoted as saying. "We are doing for them what they can't do for themselves." The article notes that multiple baptisms by proxy have been performed on Judy Garland, Charlie Chaplin, Jack Benny, W.C. Fields, Humphrey Bogart, Lucille Ball, Fred Astaire, Boris Karloff, Marilyn Monroe and Walt Disney.

At the recent conference on Jewish genealogy in Jerusalem, Yitzhak Navon, former president of the state of Israel, commented on the issue while delivering opening remarks. "I congratulate you for writing to them," he told Mokotoff. "I think Jewish genealogists in all countries should protest. The Mormons are good friends of Israel but we don't ask them to baptize us. If any of us want to be baptized, we'll find our own way."

The Mormons have a fundamental belief in genealogy and family values, and require church adherents to trace their families at least four generations back. To facilitate this research, the Mormons have built a genealogical library in Salt Lake City that is regarded as one of the finest such facilities anywhere. They have also established thousands of library branches across North America, including more than 100 across Canada, for public use.

Many Jewish family tree researchers have used materials collected by the Mormons to add generations to their own family trees. Mokotoff himself has used 19th-century Polish civil registration and other documents microfilmed by the Mormons to help him discover the names of some 300 members of his extended family who were murdered in the Holocaust.

Beth David celebrates liberation of Jerusalem

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The liberation of Jerusalem by the Israeli armed forces in the waning hours of the Six Day War in June 1967 was greeted with joy by Jews around the world.

In the intervening 27 years since the stunning victory of Israel over its enemies and the reunification of the City of Peace, Yom Yerushalayim has been commemorated with reverence and unabashed rejoicing.

This year Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue hosted a festival for Yom Yerushalayim May 9, with a cavalcade of guest speakers and musical performers.

Dror Zeigerman, consul general of Israel, led off the proceedings with an impassioned speech.

"I am from Jerusalem. I met my wife there and we are raising our children there. It remains the quintessential heart of the Jewish people and a unique place among all cities," he said.

Zeigerman went on to describe the city's wondrous character. "Here, all the great religions live side by side and worship, each to its own, in freedom and in friendship. It has survived the ravages of time and the ransacking of the Caesars, crusaders and other transient conquerors."

The consul general told his audience of over 500 that Jerusalem is nonnegotiable and that his government is committed to keeping Jerusalem as the eternal capital of Israel and the spiritual centre of Judaism. Rabbi Philip Scheim of the Beth David said he still trembles when he thinks how fortunate the Jewish people are to be able to pray at the Western Wall. "It is extraordinary times we now live in, and we must remember that it is a great privilege to be Jewish."

The evening's entertainment included a stirring performance by renowned Israeli singer Shelly Ovdat. She sang a medley of folksongs from her two recently recorded albums, Favorite Israeli Songs and Favorite Songs of Yerushalayim.

"It is your city, it is mine, it is ours forever," she said of Jerusalem. "It is the very soul of Israel and the Jewish people."

Ovdat is the featured artist at the May 29 Negev Dinner in Hamilton.

Also performing that evening was the phenomenal Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am children's choir. The powerful voices of this six-member choir thrilled the audience with a toe-tapping rendition of Shalom Aleichem. Their finale, Tefila, was a child's wish to God to protect all children, and Jerusalem too. This last piece brought a thundering ovation from the audience, leaving hardly a dry eye in the house.

"It has been an outstanding success," said Beth David Cantor Yehuda Rottiner, coordinator of the event.

The words of Elie Wiesel were cited in summing up Yom Yerushalayim: "One does not go to Jerusalem; rather, one returns to Jerusalem."

Meningitis claims Vaughan teenager

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gail Watkin isn't surprised by the thousands who have come forward to mourn her daughter Orly, who died May 9 at age 15.

"Orly did more in her 15½ years than most people do in 60, and affected more people too," she says.

Orly Watkin died of meningococcal meningitis, a bacteria carried in the throats of two to 30 per cent of the population. The flu-like symptoms include fever, vomiting, headache, stiff neck and drowsiness. Orly's was an isolated case.

Gail Watkin, 44, is sitting on her daughter's unmade bed. She looks around at the laundry piled on the floor, the giant stuffed animals propped against the wall and the cassette tapes of Bette Midler and Madonna strewn across the dresser. Only the sheet covering the mirrored headboard stands out amidst the typical teen detritus.

"Actually this is pretty neat for Orly," Gail says. "Usually you couldn't see the floor."

Gail, the managing director of the Open Window Bakery and Health Bread family businesses, stayed home from work the day of her daughter's death. Orly had won four gold medals in a tap and jazz competition just two nights before but spent the day in bed with fever, nausea and headache. Gail brought her to York Central Hospital for antibiotics.

"I had no idea, no inkling, no thought that it was so serious," her mother says. Her eyes plead for understanding. Two hours after first being seen by the emergency physicians, Orly was dead.

More than 1,000 mourners were at Orly's funeral, many of them fellow students and teachers at Vaughan Secondary School or fellow campers from Northland-B'nai Brith, where Orly (Hebrew for "my light") was to be a counsellor-in-training this summer.

"She made everybody happy," says Pearl Feig, Orly's aunt.

In addition to her dance prowess, the teen wrote poetry and short stories. She was a big fan of the soap opera Days of Our Lives. She spoke French and Hebrew, often visiting her father's family in Israel. She told her mother that while she wanted to be a professional dancer, she planned to go to university "for back-up" and train as a teacher or lawyer.

Sister Tali, 22, says she is touched to know Orly was important to so many people. She holds out a sympathy card sent by a Grade 11 student at Newtonbrook Secondary School. The writer didn't know Orly, but said a mutual friend often spoke of her "in awe."

"In a room full of people, Orly was one everybody went to. Everyone liked her, everyone went to her with their problems. She was a regular teenager, but everyone adored her," Tali says. "I'm glad I know it now."

In addition to her mother and sister, Orly is survived by grandparents Max and Rose Feig, and father Shlomo Watkin.

Employees and friends have set up the Orly Watkin Trust Fund for neurological or meningitis research. Cheques should be sent to the attention of Annie Tang at 1125 Finch Ave., Downsview, Ont., M3J 2E8.

Gail Watkin is planning to publish a booklet of her daughter's stories and poems.

Hamilton JCC seeking Rotman Award recipients

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Former recipients of the Max Rotman Humanitarian Youth Award are being sought by the Hamilton-Wentworth & Area Jewish Community Centre to be part of the 25th anniversary awards presentation at Hamilton city hall, Sunday, June 5 at 7 p.m.

The award, which is sponsored jointly by the JCC and city of Hamilton, is named in memory of Max Rotman, JCC physical education and camp director from 1953 until his untimely death in 1967.

A much loved and greatly respected youth leader, Rotman inspired and guided a whole generation of teenagers to become responsible, concerned citizens and committed members of the Jewish community.

One of those who grew up under Rotman's guidance is lawyer Howard Katz, a former JCC president and Max Rotman awards committee chair, who was honored two years ago for his 20 years of service with the committee and still continues to be involved.

The award, which honors young persons between 14 and 19 for their "cheerful dedication to their fellow man" and "performance of some outstanding humane service," is open to the entire community throughout Hamilton and surrounding area.

"It's a wonderful program where the Jewish and general communities come together to honor teenagers for their volunteer accomplishments," said JCC executive director, Neil Silvert.

Originally, one winner was chosen but several years ago it was decided that all nominees should be declared winners.

Picking one winner from the many outstanding young people nominated "was almost impossible," said former winner and current awards committee chair Pam Bojeski at the time.

Winners receive a medallion from the JCC and a certificate from city hall.

A special certificate this year will go to St. Joseph's Hospital in recognition of its "volunteens of St. Joseph's Hospital" program, which has approximately 100 participants.

Former Max Rotman award winners and nominees can call the JCC at 905-648-0605 for further information.

Ziemba lauds government's achievements

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is the question simple or simplistic? — Why, if Ontario spends millions of dollars on anti-racism programs and implements more and more initiatives aimed at stamping out racial discrimination, do racism and anti-Semitism seem to be worsening?

Elaine Ziemba, the provincial minister responsible for anti-racist policy, doesn't blink when posed the conundrum.

"It's a very complex question and complex concern," she told The CJN in a recent wide-ranging interview at her downtown office. "There are many different elements to the puzzle."

Among them are the major factors contributing to the rise of racism around the world: a global recession that is only now starting to ease, and the wildly shifting politics of the last five years — particularly in Eastern Europe — which have resulted in strong ethnic tensions. Throw in nascent right-wing movements and calls for restricted immigration, and the situation has been ripe for an ugly upswing in hatred.

The era, the mood, the re-emergence of old hostilities — all have combined to heighten racism virtually everywhere. Indeed, in Canada, B'nai Brith's most recent audit of anti-Semitic incidents showed a disturbing 31 per cent rise in anti-Jewish activity over the previous year.

"But," Ziemba is quick to add, "I always wonder that if we hadn't been doing these things, what would have happened?"

Those "things" are several ambitious initiatives Ontario's New Democrats have launched on the anti-racism front since assuming power in 1990.

Elaine Ziemba

The unflappable Ziemba, whose title barely fits on a business card (Minister of Citizenship, with responsibility for Human Rights, Disability Issues, Seniors' Issues and Race Relations) points to her government's "great strides" in combating racism and discrimination.

Accompanying some solid achievements, however, has been the NDP's traditional big government approach, which has resulted in near-glacial progress on several fronts, not to mention more bureaucracy, more regulations, more paperwork.

Ziemba's showpiece, arguably, has been the Stephen Lewis Report, released in June 1992, which made 24 recommendations on ensuring equitable treatment of minorities in Ontario.

The recommendations were contained in three key areas: education, justice and training, and have since formed the cornerstone of the government's broader anti-racism agenda.

To date, every one of Lewis's suggestions has been implemented or is being acted on, Ziemba points out. Some have crossed into several other ministries' jurisdictions.

Programs have encompassed employment equity, anti-racist education and policies on multiculturalism in schools, better access to professions and trades, race relations training for police and generally, increased representation of racial minorities in government, schools and community bodies.

The centre-piece of Lewis's report — and in which Ziemba herself has put a great deal of stock — has been the Cabinet Roundtable on Anti-Racism, composed of six cabinet ministers, Premier Bob Rae's parliamentary assistant and 13 community representatives.

The Jewish community's delegate is Gerda Frieberg, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region.

Announced in December 1992, the roundtable has met three times to hammer out priorities for Ontario's anti-racism agenda and to establish more subcommittees on specific issues, including, Ziemba notes, "the whole area of hate crimes and how we look at them. There has been some progress, at least some recognition that this is a serious component of racism and that we must work toward finding solutions. But there's a lot of work still to be done.

"What we've noticed at the cabinet roundtable is that everybody wants to get on with it and do something. They actually want to come up with solutions.

"The roundtable has taken a particular interest in all areas of anti-Semitism and hate-related activity. They're looking at laws that exist and how we can build on them. I think good stuff is going to come out of that."

Still "under study" by the roundtable is a campaign announced in September 1992 by the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat designed specifically to fight anti-Semitism.

The "pro-active" plan called on several ministries to look into the recruitment by white supremacist groups of young people; racially motivated crime; laws allowing group defamation action and other measures aimed at stemming traditional anti-Jewish behavior.

Twenty months later, the roundtable is "expanding" on the recommendations, which are still "in the exploratory stage," Ziemba explains.

The minister takes the slow pace in stride. For one, she dismisses charges that Attorney-General Marion Boyd is ignoring entreaties from the Jewish community to charge pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel with hate crimes.

"It's a perceived lack of progress," she counters. "There has been work done and there has been contact with officials on proceeding [with laying charges]. It's pretty well now up to the attorney-general."

Ziemba adds that Boyd has met with several American attorneys-general to hear how hate crimes, racist propaganda and group defamation are handled stateside.

Also of interest to the Jewish community, especially immigrants, she notes, is the government's access to trades and professions initiative, which aims to remove barriers for minorities and foreign-trained tradespeople and professionals.

With polls showing her party at 14 per cent support, Ziemba hopes the government's work on anti-racism will continue should the NDP be defeated in the next vote, in a time when it's needed most.

Forest Hill reunion planned

TORONTO — Forest Hill Collegiate is inviting former students, staff and the community to come home.

The homecoming, called for 1 p.m. May 29, will showcase memorabilia and photos from the '40s onwards, followed by the official opening of the school's new three-storey addition at 3:30 p.m.

"This event [is] the ideal time for old classmates and their teachers to get together, perhaps for the first time since graduation," said school principal Alan Scott.

Some of those former students include artist Robert Bateman, author Joy Fielding, clothing designer Marci Lipman, Saturday Night Live producer Lorne Michaels, Bram Morrison of the children's group Sharon, Lois and Bram, broadcaster Knowlton Nash, journalist Rick Salutin and hotelier Issy Sharp.

The addition includes a computerized library with state-of-the-art multimedia labs and an expanded auditorium. The new air-conditioning system is the first of its kind to be installed in Toronto.

Homecoming is free and there is no need to preregister. All former students and staff are invited to attend.

JIAS forum issues community challenge

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How to get immigrants to Toronto connected to Jewish services and make them feel more at home Jewishly were key themes explored by over 100 community representatives at a day-long forum earlier this month.

The Leadership Consultation on Toronto Jewish Immigrant Issues, sponsored by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of Toronto, effectively challenged the community to integrate Jewish newcomers to the city — before it's too late.

Lay leaders and professionals from synagogues, National Council of Jewish Women, Jewish Vocational Services, the Jewish Women's Federation and Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto joined immigrant leaders for a brainstorming session on how to facilitate links between new arrivals and the local community.

Recent immigrants, especially from the former Soviet Union, often have little or no attachment to Judaism, and are in danger of melting into the general population, the conference was told.

In the past five years, over 6,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union have arrived in Toronto and they continue to come at the rate of 1,500 annually.

More recently, another 100 Jews have come to Toronto from war-torn Sarajevo. They joined the 12,000-strong South African Jewish emigre community and the Israeli population, whose size is said to range from 30,000 to 50,000.

JIAS's involvement with immigrants entails assistance mainly with finances, housing and employment. Once that initial period is over, newcomers are in danger of drifting away from Judaism, conference chair Sandy Atlin told The CJN.

While South Africans arrive here speaking the language and with a well-developed support network, Russians come with little or no English and often face culture shock, Atlin noted.

Israelis face another barrier, she added — a prevalent feeling that anyone who leaves Israel, especially a sabra, is hurting the Jewish state.

The overriding concern, however, is keeping Jewish immigrants plugged into the Jewish community, Atlin stressed.

And those newcomers seem to want Jewish content. JIAS's experience has shown that following jobs and language training, immigrants want Jewish programming, JIAS Toronto director Perry Romberg said, a finding he called "surprising," given many immigrants' supposed lack of affinity to Judaism.

Some suggestions to come out of the conference included the establishment of a "friendship network," in which more seasoned emigres could help new arrivals access community services.

Another was to work more closely with and complement the work of the community integration program at Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The need for synagogues to reach out to newcomers was stressed.

A "dream program," as Atlin called it, would be Jews helping other Jews find jobs.

Employment is "the greatest need" faced by an immigrant, she noted, followed closely by the need to upgrade and retool skills.

Another issue raised was the need by the established community to overcome its "psychological barrier" to Israelis coming here.

Holocaust seminar draws over 300 Hamilton kids

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hamilton's first ever student seminar on the Holocaust was an unqualified success.

Three hundred Grade 11 to OAC students from five public and five separate high schools attended the morning seminar, which was held in the Burke Science Building at McMaster University.

They listened attentively and with evident interest to guest speaker Inge Auerbacher, author of I Am a Star, Child of the Holocaust, as she told of what it was like to be a small Jewish child in Nazi Germany and of the three years she and her parents spent in the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

But they were even more impressed with the stories of survivors they later met face to face in small group sessions. These, as their evaluation sheets showed, were the most valuable of all.

The students were sensitive and clearly aware of the importance of the seminar. "Everybody should hear these survivors because we don't want to repeat history," wrote one; while another observed that the "seminar is needed for this generation . . . [so that] people will not forget or deny that it happened."

"As the survivors pass away, the children and grandchildren will be able to tell about the experiences," and learning about the Holocaust from survivors themselves is "absolutely the most effective Holocaust education," were other comments. One student wrote that "half a day was too short."

Most felt they would have liked to hear more about the survivors' experiences in concentration camps, but appreciated that for many these memories are too painful.

Approximately 75 per cent of those who attended filled out evaluation sheets and all declared the seminar to have been worthwhile.

A long-planned sabbatical leave in Israel unfortunately prevented committee chair, Dr. Nadia Rosa, a Czech-born child survivor of Theresienstadt, who had worked hard to ensure the success of the seminar, from being present; but equally hard working co-chair Beverley Lasky was elated.

Their hard work had paid off and next year, Lasky hopes the seminar will be a full-day event for double the number of students.

The seminar was sponsored by the history department of McMaster University, the Hamilton Public School Board, the Hamilton-Wentworth & Area Roman Catholic Board of Education and the Jewish Federation — Hamilton-Wentworth & Area.

Study disproves myths about survivors' children

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — Contrary to conventionally accepted theories, adult children of Holocaust survivors do not differ significantly from other Jewish adults, according to a Montreal psychologist.

Dr. John Sigal, psychologist and McGill University psychiatry professor shared his hypothesis, data and interpretations about children of Holocaust survivors with over 150 people at the Lillian Burden Memorial Lecture held at Congregation Or Shalom.

In a random sample survey of Holocaust survivor families and other Jewish families, completed in Montreal in 1987, Sigal and his colleague Mort Weinfeld began with the hypothesis that when Holocaust survivor parents are physically or psychologically scarred by their experiences, their children are also adversely affected.

Based on anecdotal clinical observation, Sigal and Weinfeld felt that survivors with tormented memories were left with few emotional resources to attend to their children; many pushed their children too hard and had separation and communication problems with their children.

The study included three groups: adult children of Holocaust survivors, those with at least one parent who immigrated to Canada before World War II, and those with two Canadian-born parents.

Not only did the study disprove the initial hypothesis, it suggested that the Holocaust experience often has a positive effect on children of survivors and many have an excellent relationship with their parents.

Survey participants were asked, "Do you think you were affected by your parents' experience in the Holocaust?" Forty-eight per cent felt there had been a negative effect, but 52 per cent said it had affected them positively.

Some respondents felt they "were less complacent about Jewish survival and felt they had a strong Jewish identity," said Sigal.

There seemed to be no difference between the three groups of adult children (age 19-36) in their self-esteem, level of depression, social contacts, occupations, marriage and children, or satisfaction with their achievements.

Looking at parent-child communication. Sigal discovered that 84 per cent of children with both parents surviving the Holocaust spoke to their parents at least once a day, as compared with 65 per cent of children with at least one immigrant parent and 80 per cent of children with Canadian born parents, again showing no significant difference among the three groups.

The only noticeable difference was seen in survivors' children who had sought psychological help; they had lower self-esteem and troubled relationships with their parents, and felt more guilt.

Confirming the findings of the study, one member of the audience, a child of a survivor, commented on her father's openness. "He always shared his experiences with us, no matter how terrible they were," she said.

BGU honors Grossman

OTTAWA — A 3,500-year-old water jug from the Negev desert was presented to William (Bill) Grossman at the Ben-Gurion University Tribute Luncheon held in his honor recently, at the home of Dr. David and Miriam Algom in Ottawa.

In her introduction, chair of the event, Susannah Dalfen, president of the Ottawa chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University (CABGU) said, "Bill Grossman is well-loved in our community. He's done so much for the community and for Jews around the world."

Leo H. Marcus, national executive director of the CABGU who presented Grossman with the Ben-Gurion Negev Award, explained. "We found, in Beersheva, Ethiopian immigrants who wanted to go to university but couldn't afford to. Most of them are married and couldn't go to school and put bread on the table for their families." When Grossman was asked to support the education of these immigrants, he readily agreed.

A scroll of honor, read by Claire Horowitz, executive director, Ontario region, was presented to Grossman "in recognition and appreciation of his dedication to the values of Judaism . . . , his inspirational and exemplary leadership . . . , and his many acts of philanthropy and benevolence in the cause of higher education in Israel."

Grossman, a survivor of the Holocaust, is proud of his contributions to the survival of the Jewish people, supporting some 180 organizations annually. He has been honored by former prime minister Brian Mulroney as a recipient of a Commonwealth 125 award for contributions to "business, community and to Canada."

Keynote speaker Gerda Frieberg, chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, herself a Holocaust survivor, praised Grossman and commended Israel for coming to the aid of the Ethiopians.

Her worship Jacquelin Holzman, mayor of Ottawa also addressed the assembly, describing her visit to Ben-Gurion University in June 1993 and praising the Grossman family for their contribution to the quality of life in Ottawa."

Proceeds from the luncheon are being directed towards the William and Laya Grossman Scholarship Fund for Ethiopian Immigrant Students at Ben-Gurion University.

Eli Yerushalmi, councillor at the Israeli Embassy, brought greetings. Tribute committee member Dr. Eve Shulman was recognized as were Grossman's daughter, Vera Klein, and son-in-law, Dr. Leslie Klein.

Bible contest winners named

TORONTO — Twelve students from Jewish schools in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver emerged as winners in this year's National Bible Contest finals held recently in Toronto at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue in Thornhill.

One hundred and forty-seven participants from Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, London, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria participated in this annual event.

The contest is co-sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Toronto Board of Jewish Education, Montreal's Jewish Education Council and the Jewish National Fund.

In the senior division for Grades 9 to 13, Tzvi Goldman of Yeshivat Or Chaim won first place. He will represent Canada at next year's World Contest for Jewish Youth to be held in Jerusalem on Yom Ha'atzmaut 1995.

Second place in the senior division was won by Channa Lockshin of Ulpana Orot. Jill Crackower of Montreal's Bialik High School placed third.

In the intermediate divisions for Grades 7-8, Beth Sapiro of United Synagogue Day Schools placed first. Laura Erdman of the same school placed second. The third spot in this division was filled by Alta Peerless of Montreal's Hebrew Academy.

Yehuda Basser of Eitz Chaim Schools (Patricia Branch) was awarded first place in the junior division for Grades 5-6. In second place was Carolyn Gehr of the Akiva School, Montreal. Jordana Rothstein of the Vancouver Talmud Torah came in third.

Designated as Kallat Yisrael was Tzippi Tapuchi of Eitz Chaim's Spring Farm branch. This title is bestowed upon an Israeli student living in Canada, and who, by Bible Contest rules, cannot represent Canada at the World Competition in Israel.

In the English language division open to students of congregational and supplementary schools, Rudy Bromberg of Toronto's United Congregational Schools edged out Alexander Orwin of Downtown Jewish Community School for first place. In third was Sarah-Jane Morrison.

The contest involves both written and oral components. The four-member panel included Dr. Barry Levy of McGill University; Shawn Zelig Aster, a former Bible Contest winner; and Reuven Yalon, director of educational services for the Board of Jewish Education.

The contest was coordinated by Yael Selinger and Ruth Silverberg of the Board and Shlomo Shimon of the Jewish Education Council of Montreal.

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Who will pay for the Thibaudeau decision? (second of three parts)

In the May 12 issue I discussed four specific reasons for the recent Federal Court of Appeal ruling that Mrs. Thibaudeau, a single mother receiving child support payments, did not have to pay taxes on them. (Since that article, the Federal Government has announced its intention to appeal). There are, however, some even broader considerations underlying the decision:

1. On its surface the Income Tax Act discriminates against single custodial parents, usually women. Since the Act creates discrimination, family law courts and lawyers should not have to clean up the mess the Income Tax Act creates in each case by having to predict tax consequences for support payments. In short, family law and single parenting is difficult enough without the need for taxes to sort out.

2. Family law is not an exact science and many women are being very unfairly treated when the appropriate tax calculations should be made. According to a report by Judge R. Williams (1989) and accepted by the Court, a survey of 147 judges suggested that only a minority of lawyers present income tax calculations to the Courts where it would be appropriate to do so.

3. It's an unfair burden to have women "save" the tax portion of their monthly support payments to be remitted to the Government on April 30 of each year. The Court ruled that "in some cases it is not financially possible to save this money each month without depriving the children."

Surprisingly, the Court refused to rule that the payor spouse (usually men) could no longer deduct the child support payments. This ruling fundamentally challenges a long-established principle that if a taxpayer benefits in making a payment by virtue of a tax deduction, then the recipient usually pays taxes on the payment.

The court also anticipated that Ms. Thibaudeau's ex-husband could now go back to the Courts and ask to lower his current child support payment because his ex-wife no longer needed part of it to pay taxes. If the wife's income is substantially enhanced by her now being able to keep all of her support payment, the husband may have sufficient cause to argue that she no longer needs as much money from him in order to help cover the costs of raising the children in her custody. The husband could then ask a family law lawyer to go to Court for a reduction in the payments he is making, since her effective income or "yield" may have risen dramatically if she no longer needs to pay tax on what she receives.

Some predict that the government will now move to eliminate the ex-husband's ability to deduct the support payment from his taxable income, since there is no longer any corresponding ability by the government to tax the income as it arrives into the ex-wife's hands. The lost revenue may well be replaced by forcing the payor spouse (usually ex-husbands) to forgo their ability to deduct and hence pay a lot more income tax.

If this happens, then ex-husbands will have two reasons to ask the courts to lower the ex-wife's child support payment: (a) the ex-wife now has more net disposable income because she no longer pays income tax on the payment; and (b) the ex-husband's ability to pay may have been dramatically reduced because he will have to pay more in taxes, leaving him with less money to pay child support and his other expenses.

In the June 9 issue I'll examine the chaos these developments could wreak on our already overburdened family law courts and legal aid programs unless the Supreme Court quickly resolves these problems.

High school wins science award

NORTH YORK — Wm. Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute has received a Roberta Bondar Science and Technology Award from the province of Ontario for educational achievement in science and technology.

The award was presented earlier this month by Ontario Premier Bob Rae; Dave Cooke, Minister of Education and Training; and Dr. Roberta Bondar at the ROM Theatre, Royal Ontario Museum, 100 Queen's Park.

The award and a cheque for $5,000 recognize the school's outstanding programs in science and technology. In 1985, Mackenzie established a system-wide program for talented North York students in Mathematics, Computers and Science. In technology, the school has been a leader in the change from industrial arts to broad-based technology studies, encouraging all students to use technical labs. Student groups such as the Classics Club, for example, have used the technology lab to build a Roman chariot and replicas ot archeological artifacts. Science students build innumerable objects ranging from electric motors, and catapults, to toothpick bridges and complete science fair projects.

The school also has a Creative Inquiry Centre which enables students to do crossover work in several subjects at once using state-of-the-art technologies. For example, in a recent biology independent study project on Glycolysis, students digitized laser disk images; transferred files between different computer platforms; composed original music using a computer sequencer; created original animation; did video genlocks in series to create overlapping effects; added clips from science films; and completed voice-over sound editing.

"This is notable as a recognition of the school's efforts and for the person who bears the award's name," said North York Board of Education director Veronica Lacey. "Dr. Bondar, a true Canadian hero, has motivated many of our students, particularly young women, to pursue their studies and careers in mathematics, science and technology. We are truly honored."

Parents urged to respect children

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The most important thing parents can do for their children is treat them with respect says a Baltimore rabbi and Torah educator.

"If you give a person the confidence to believe in himself, then you've made that person and to make a child believe in himself is a great thing," says Rabbi Yissocher Frand.

Rabbi Frand, a member of the Hanhalla of Yeshiva Ner Yisroel of Baltimore, was the guest lecturer at the recent second annual Sam and Sarah Kerzner Memorial Lecture sponsored by Eitz Chaim Schools. The lecture, entitled And Best of All, I'm Very Humble: A Torah Perspective on Self-Esteem, was endowed by Joseph Kerzner, son of Sam and Sarah.

Rabbi Frand told the capacity crowd at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue that those who feel good about themselves will have a healthy ego and in turn act humble.

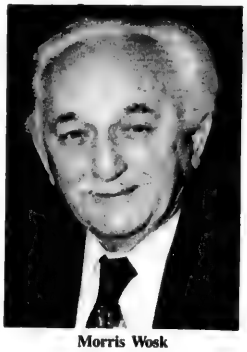
"That is the irony. Those that feel worthless act self-absorbed and always have to have praise. The better one feels about himself, the less they need to be self-absorbed. It is crucial to instil a sense of worth and importance in children or they will have to act like the self-absorbed. People who know their self-worth do not have to make noise."

Rabbi Frand said a humble person does not deny his talents, but rather realizes these abilities are a loan and can sometimes be temporary. "Talents, abilities, position and power are only leases and leases can be up tomorrow. If you bear that in mind, you will still be humble.

"As well as being aware of his talents, however, a person has to realize the responsibilities these talents place on him, and use them to help. A person who feels his responsibilities will be humble. . .One must be able to see other people — that is what being a Jew is all about."

Order of British Columbia awarded to Vancouver Jews

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent



Morris Wosk

Dr. Martin Schechter

VICTORIA — Two members of Vancouver's Jewish community, Morris Wosk and Dr. Martin Schechter, have been named to the Order of British Columbia and will be presented with their awards in a ceremony at Government House in Victoria on June 16.

In all, 12 "outstanding British Columbians" were chosen for the province's highest award, said B.C. Premier Mike Harcourt in making the announcement. "These distinguished men and women have made a tremendous contribution to science, business, the environment, literature and the community," he said.

First awarded in 1990, the Order of British Columbia now includes 80 British Columbians. It is presented annually to individuals who have excelled in any field that benefits people, including community service, sports, the arts, labor, research and the professions.

The premier said recipients are selected by an independent committee headed by the Chief Justice of B.C.

Morris Wosk, a prominent member of the Jewish community, has lived in Vancouver for over 65 years since he came from Odessa as a young man. He is well-known as a philanthropist and contributes generously to a wide variety of causes including many Jewish ones, as well as such organizations as the Mennonite Bible Institute, the Bethany Bible Institute, the Variety Club, the Vancouver Symphony, the Vancouver General Hospital, the Salvation Army and others.

He was awarded an honorary doctorate by the Hebrew University in 1989, and a gold medal by Israel Bonds, the Mount Scopus Award of Hebrew University, the Prime Minister's Medal of the State of Israel and the Torah Umesorah National Award in New York. In April 1993 he was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada.

During his 62 years in business in Vancouver, Wosk has employed thousands of people as owner/manager of a chain of furniture retail stores. In the past 25 years he has been active in real estate investment including building and managing apartment complexes.

His wife, Dena, a talented violinist has won a gold medal from the Royal Academy of Music in England. The Wosks have three sons and a daughter and five grandchildren.

Dr. Martin Schechter, a physician and medical researcher, is professor of epidemiology at the University of British Columbia and is known nationally and internationally for his work on the transmission and natural history of HIV infection.

Schechter has served on numerous committees and panels, including the B.C. and Canada Advisory Committee on AIDS. In 1989 he helped organize the fifth international conference on AIDS, which attracted 12,000 delegates from around the world.

In 1990, Schechter was one of only 10 persons worldwide invited by the World Health Organization Global Program on AIDS to serve on the steering committee on epidemiology, forecasting and surveillance.

Schechter's wife Janice is also a doctor, employed by the province. They are active in the Peretz Institute.

Children's dance festival marks Jerusalem reunification

By ROSE TOGMAN HEILBROON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — All 360 dancing children radiated joy during the 24th annual Israeli Dance Festival for Children, held at York University May 9.

The theme of the Rikudiyah was Jerusalem the Eternal, which celebrated the 27th anniversary of Jerusalem's reunification during the Six Day War.

"Each dance celebrates Jerusalem with most songs based on biblical quotations about the holy city," said festival director Teme Kernerman.

More than 1,200 audience members, including special guests Premier Bob Rae and his wife, turned out to see 17 dance groups from Toronto and Hamilton Jewish schools, as well as the Me'Irim Dance Company, the resident modern dance company of Toronto's Koffler School of Dance.

The Rikudiyah was sponsored by the Jewish Community Centre and the Board of Jewish Education of Toronto.

The Me'Irim troupe opened the program with Yerusha (Hebrew for legacy), choreographed by director Shula Saltzman to music by Srul Irving Glick.

The dancers represented the four Matriarchs — Sarah, Rivka, Rachel and Leah — and all Jewish women since then.

"When Jewish women hand on their tradition from the generations to the next as we do in this dance, than the name Yerushalayim becomes complete," Kernerman said. The dancers' soft, fluid movements in this melodic piece ended in a tableau of unity.

Then the children, marching and clapping, burst into a blue-and-white kaleidoscope of movement filling the entire floor of the Tait McKenzie Gymnasium. With electric enthusiasm, they proceeded through eight rehearsed dances, two specially choreographed by Kernerman. They also performed a new dance which they learned en masse while Kernerman instructed from the microphone.

As part of their costume, the children wore bright blue T-shirts imprinted with a white graphic of Jerusalem, created by graphic designer Ofra Nadel.

More than aynthing else in the 1½ hour program, the energy of 360 young Jewish voices shouting "Yerushalayim" in unison, at the end of Shiru Hashir brought tears to many audience members.

The audience often erupted in spontaneous, rhythmic clapping.

Like Jerusalem, the dances reflected different ethnic influences: European, Yemenite and Chassidic. "The children learn about Israeli sub-cultures through dance," said Kernerman.

Twenty-four years ago, in a small room in the northern branch of the Jewish Community Centre, Teme Kernerman pioneered Rikudiyah with 40 children. Over the years, groups have travelled from as far as Sarnia and Montreal to participate in this popular community event.

What benefits the children is a boost to their self esteem. No one auditions for Rikudiyah. Every child who wants to can dance.

The festival's purpose, according to Kernerman, is to bring Israel closer to the children through dance. She implants in the participants "an excitement not only for Israeli dance but for Jewish culture.

"It's my way of reaching out to the children," she says, "and showing them this is not only educational, it's fun. When you enjoy something as a child, that feeling stays with you for life."

Conservative women hold conference

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian Seaway, the new union of the Ontario and Eastern Canada branches of the Women's League for Conservative Judaism, recently held its first spring conference.

Themed Bayachad (Together We Are One), the two-day conference held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, focused on the new union and included sessions on new directions for women in the '90s with CFRB talk show host Rhonda Katz and the enrichment of Jewish lives.

Evelyn Seelig, conference consultant and keynote speaker at the opening dinner, said the theme reaffirmed that "our faith is broad enough to encompass all forms of Judaism. The credo we must pursue is that the welfare of Am Israel transcends all parochial interests."

Seelig said the Women's League for Conservative Judaism wants to help fix the world. "We have always been activists in the synagogue and the community. Sisterhood women believe that voluntary service is the rent one pays for the gift of life."

But Seelig said synagogues cannot exist alone, "they have to have homes that love Judaism and it is never too late to learn. Children will respect what you respect and practice what you practice. . .Jewish mothers are still the driving force behind their children's education by juggling and arranging to make sure their Jewish education is fulfilled."

She said synagogue sisterhoods are obliged to bring spirituality into their congregations.

Officers installed include Terry Winston as president; Bea Muroff, Carol Sher, Linda Lallouz, Leona Elligberg and Sonia Slobodsky as vice-presidents; Rose Haspel as treasurer; Ruth Cooper, Deenie Reiken, Ethel Phillips, Arlene Tennenhouse and Phyllis Vines as secretaries; and Janice Steinberg as parliamentarian.

Envoy's duty ends

MONTREAL — Itzhak Levanon, Israel's consul general to Eastern Canada, has announced that he will be returning to Israel in August after serving a four-year term in Montreal.

Levanon, 49, arrived in Montreal in September 1990, initially to serve a three-year term. He succeeded Chalom Schirman, who also served four years as consul general.

Levanon said he was asked to extend his stay for two years — until the summer of 1995 — but decided to return to his home in Jerusalem later this year so his family could be together.

"It was strictly a family decision," he said. "My son Yariv [who was in Montreal] had to go back to Israel to join the army, and I thought it would be best for the family to all be together.

"This was the major consideration. The family should come before anything else."

Levanon said he has enjoyed "every single moment" of his stay in Montreal and that he developed a great fondness for the Jewish community here.

He will return with his wife, Edna, and another son, David, 12.

A daughter, Tali, 22, remained in Israel to serve in the army.

Dementia's effects on elderly discussed at conference

TORONTO — As more Canadians survive into their 80s and 90s, they and their families will be faced with the devastating effects of dementing illness which robs people of their vital abilities to remember, reason, understand and speak.

Although Alzheimer's Disease is the most common type, representing about 60 per cent of all dementing illness, it isn't the only one, says Dr. Donald Stuss, a neuroscientist and director of the Rotman Research Institute at Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"As we've developed better diagnostic tools which provide a clearer window to the brain, we have significantly redefined our concepts of dementia," says Stuss.

At a recent international conference on dementia co-sponsored by the Rotman Research Institute and the University of California at Los Angeles, experts in neuroscience presented the latest information on the diagnosis and management of cognitive disorders.

The conference, which attracted more than 250 doctors and other health care professionals, was supported by a major grant from a U.S. charitable group, the French Foundation for Alzheimer's Research. Other supporters included the Ontario Mental Health Foundation, Parke Davis and Merck Frosst Canada Inc.

One type of dementia which has been recognized over the past decade is frontal dementia, where damage to the brain is clustered in the frontal lobes.

"Unlike Alzheimer's Disease, these cases show up more often in adults under 65," explained Dr. David Neary, a neurologist at Manchester University in England.

Frontal dementia often manifests itself with symptoms such as anxiety, depression and hypochondria. The condition strikes equal numbers of men and women (unlike Alzheimer's which is slightly more common among women) and is characterized by changes in language and personality.

"These people may become very slowed down and apathetic, or highly overactive," said Neary. "They can become excessively sentimental or emotionally remote, and there are often stereotyped behaviors such as overeating, going on fad diets, and hoarding objects."

Doctors have discovered important differences between Alzheimer's Disease and frontal dementias, said Dr. Morris Freedman, director of behavioral neurology at Baycrest Centre.

"People with frontal dementia lose their social abilities early on in the disease, while these skills are preserved in Alzheimer's patients, except in later stages of the illness," he explained. "Alzheimer's patients generally experience early loss of memory and an impaired spatial ability which causes them to become lost in familiar surroundings. But people suffering from frontal dementia tend to retain memory longer and are able to navigate.

Being able to differentiate between various types of dementia is extremely important, explains Stuss. "This gives patients and doctors a better idea about the cause of the disorder. If treatment is available, we can then begin it earlier, which may delay deterioration."

Scientists are also revising some long-held opinions about Alzheimer's Disease, said Dr. Frank Benson, a professor of neurology at the UCLA School of of Medicine.

"I think we're moving away from the idea that Alzheimer's is irreversible and towards the concept that it's more treatable and controllable," he said. "After all, we don't reverse diseases like diabetes — we treat them and give patients longer, better lives."

While the loss of cognitive abilities is a major feature of Alzheimer's Disease, patients, families and doctors must confront other problems, said Dr. Dillip V. Jeste, director of the Geriatric Psychiatry Clinical Research Centre at the San Diego Veterans Administration Medical Centre.

"About one-third of people with Alzheimer's have symptoms of psychosis such as delusions or hallucinations, and one-fifth have depressive disorders," he explained.

Research has shown that people who experience these psychotic symptoms as part of Alzheimer's Disease, are more disabled and deteriorate faster than those without psychosis.

"These symptoms result in upsetting behavioral problems which produce a great deal of stress among caregivers of Alzheimer's patients," said Jeste. "Caregivers say that delusions and agitation are more difficult for them to cope with than physical problems such as incontinence and are more likely to result in institutionalization."

London Jews to buy million dollar bond

LONDON, Ont. — For the first time ever, the Jewish community of London, Ontario is purchasing a Million Dollar Note under the Israel Bond High Yield Note Program.

The Note is a loan by a Canadian bank to individuals or organizations for Israel's benefit. Note purchasers often profit because the interest Israel pays is higher than that charged by the bank.

Although Million Dollar Notes are fairly common in Toronto and Montreal, they are rare for smaller centres like London.

According to London Israel Bond co-chair Martin Shapiro, it took three and a half years for the Note campaign to be launched. "The people were there but they had to be convinced," he says."

The Note was eventually signed by three active community members, who prefer to remain anonymous for now.

About 2,500 Jews live in London, which has three synagogues and a Jewish day school.

Although Israel Bond sales started in London only five years ago, last year set a sales record, says Shapiro. He credits this success to Israel's 7.5 per cent return on the Canadian Variable Rate Issue Bond, which has since sold out. However, Israel recently raised rates substantially on its Zero Coupon Savings Bond and the Economic Development Issue Bond, which now pay 7 per cent and 7.2 per cent respectively.

Shapiro hopes that London's achievement, to be celebrated during a community event on May 29, will encourage other Jewish communities of similar size to do the same.

Beth Tikvah's concert season ends with spirited recital

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The final jewel in the triple crown concert series of Musica Beth Tikvah Synagogue took place recently with a spirited recital by chamber ensemble Trio Lyra.

The score sheets featured orchestrations by Canadian composers Ben Steinberg, Milton Barnes, Srul Irving Glick and a world premiere performance of Touchpoints for Flute, Viola and Harp by Harry Freedman.

Comprised of Suzanne Shulman, flute, Erica Goodman, harp, and Mark Childs, viola, each member of Trio Lyra is a master musician in their own right. Collectively, they represent the finest blend of ensemble virtuosity currently playing on the concert circuit.

Formed in 1978, Trio Lyra performs repertoire from the Baroque era to the contemporary. The group has commissioned numerous works which they have performed at concert venues in North America and Europe. The acclaim they have garnered and their list of awards keeps growing.

The Beth Tikvah recital was dedicated to the memory of Hyman Goodman, Goodman's father, who passed away recently in Los Angeles. A renowned Toronto violinist, he had played with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra from 1931, becoming its concertmaster from 1948 to 1967. Before his retirement in 1988, he had performed under the baton of this century's best known conductors, including Sir Colin Davis, Sir John Barbiroli and Leopold Stowkowski.

Goodman's solo performance in honor of her father was Barnes's bluesy, quasi-religious (the composer's own descriptions), Variations for Solo Harp. It was a treat and the definite high point of the evening's musical offerings. The audience, which numbered several hundred, cheered her tour de force.

Composers discuss 'Jewish music'

"She is this country's premier harpist," observed Glick, Beth Tikvah's composer-in-residence. "The harp is unique in its technique and expression. It is certainly different from the piano and, in some respects, more challenging for the performer. Erica is a consummate artist, with an awesome ability to extract the most beautifully sensuous sounds from her instrument."

After the concert, Beth Tikvah's season concluded with the four featured composers holding a panel discussion on the topic: Jewish Music — Is There a Difference.

Freedman spoke about his younger days, spent in the pursuit of art and painting. He turned to music as his life's passion when he heard the artistry of Cole Porter, Irving Berlin and the Gershwins. "My religion has not particularly affected the kind of music I write, though," he said. "I am a composer who happens to be Jewish, not a composer of Jewish music."

Glick continued the theme by relating that he was born into a musical family, one that surrounded him with Jewish songs and verse. "When I started to write my own compositions, it was this style that literally poured out of me."

"Jewish music is much more than just Fiddler on the Roof," commented Barnes. "It is more of an exploration of a people with a distinct identity." He went on to reveal that a large portion of his more than 100 major compositions have been directly inspired by the music he was brought up with.

His music is a search for self, he explained. He wrote his first 'Jewish' works in 1958, and that initial process proved to be arduous and very difficult for him. Today however, his Jewish compositions are sweet, natural self-expressions and the melodies "flow with ease."

The issue of the difference between Jewish songs and other forms is not a matter of question for Steinberg. He is also well-known for his lecture-recitals at universities across North America. He is presently director of music for Toronto's Temple Sinai Congregation.

Israeli troupe gets audience involved

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When the Bimama Theatre of Israel comes to town, the audience goes on stage.

The renowned children's theatre entertained students at seven Toronto Jewish Day Schools, under the sponsorship of the Jewish National Fund.

Their forte is audience participation and the kindergarten and Grade one children at Bialik Hebrew Day School took up the challenge recently by shouting, "Give him a kiss on the cheek," when Ronen Goldfarb begged for affection from co-actor Bilha Mass, one of the founders of the Israeli troupe.

The Bialik children poured onto the stage to hold giant puppets carrying a message of racial tolerance and were even given lines of dialogue to speak.

Along with stage manager Yuval Pinto, Mass and Goldfarb also performed in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Montreal and Ottawa with the scaled-down version of their repertoire. They were escorted on the three-week Canadian tour by Roni Kadmiel, wife of the Toronto JNF shaliach.

There is no difference between Israeli children and Canadian children in their reaction to the short musical plays, according to Mass.

The poetry and songs of Chaim Nachman Bialik and Lea Goldberg were featured in the Canadian production, with English translation by Jerry Hyman.

Goldfarb and Mass were particularly enthusiastic about their warm reception and invitations to homes in Winnipeg and Vancouver.

TO LIFE.... TO LIFE.... TO LIFE.... TO LIFE.... TO LIFE....

Laser Medical Centre

Three years ago, Dr. Shia Wolgelernter decided that like other major centres, Toronto needed a medical laser centre for skin disorders. His success in meeting this challenge is shown in the results of his patients.

Lisa V. had an unsightly reddish patch on one side of her neck. Crude early laser treatments, steroids and surgery failed to help. Once Dr. Wolgelernter began treating her with the Dye laser, designed for port-wine stains and other disfiguring skin lesions, the red color began to fade. After five sessions, Lisa V. looked forward to no longer having to wear cover-up makeup or turtleneck sweaters. Mr. Gerald H. had a cluster of facial veins on the bridge of his nose. After two treatments the veins were gone.

Laser light is absorbed by blood vessel pigment rather than skin pigment, destroying vascular lesions without damaging neighboring tissue as earlier lasers did. The light transmits heat to blood vessel walls, making them stick together while drying the blood; this process causes the lesions to fade.

Another laser at the office, the Q-switched laser eliminates liver spots, freckles, age spots, sun spots, tattoos and non-blood-based color. Pulsed dye lasers, which have superseded the tunable laser, works on vascular or blood-based pigments like those in birthmarks and facial or fine spider leg veins.

Portwine stains are found at birth. Most common causes of facial veins are: over-exposure to sun, heredity, chronic use of steroid creams on the face, pregnancy, hormones or post-surgical procedures. Pigmented lesions, which occur in about 15 percent of the population, usually have causes like those of vascular lesions.

Laser treatments generally take 15 minutes and cause minimal discomfort. Patients can return home or to work following treatment but may require some makeup.

Most of those who want treatment come for cosmetic reasons. About 75 percent have vascular lesions, 25 percent pigmented lesions, and 5 percent PWS (Port Wine Stain). PWS marks are usually the most dramatically disfiguring, especially in children, and may darken over the years.

As women age, they face the distress of varicose veins on the legs, and spider veins on the face and legs. Four out of ten women suffer from them, and eight out of 100 men. Heredity is the main cause, but because puberty, birth control pills, pregnancy and estrogen supplements seem to bring them out, estrogen is thought to contribute to them. So are tight clothes, trauma, overweight, prolonged sitting or standing, excessive sunbathing and drinking.

Anke W., had been unable to wear shorts or bathing suits—until she learned about sclerotherapy from Dr. Wolgelernter. In this non-surgical procedure, a salt water, sugar and alcohol solution is injected into the blood vessel. The solution irritates the vein wall lining, making it swell and stick together. Over a few weeks, the vein fades and finally becomes barely visible. After two sessions, Anke W. noticed great improvement in her legs.

Dr. Wolgelernter judges sclerotherapy to be very effective. It began in Europe in the 1930's. Today, with improvements in technique and greater consciousness of physical appearance, people want earlier treatment. .Sclerotherapy has come back, spreading to North America.

Sclerotherapy is considered to be cosmetic and therapeutic for people with painful varicose veins. It is safe, requires neither hospitalization nor anesthesia. Discomfort is minimal, and swelling or bruising after treatment is short-term. Dr. Wolgelernter prefers sclerotherapy for the legs, where the veins are thick; for smaller veins he prefers the laser.

Cost for each sclerotherapy session is $75, if it is purely cosmetic. OHIP covers the cost if treatment is therapeutic and for PWS treatments on the head, neck and extremities, if the stain is bigger than ten centimeters. Everything else is "cosmetic", and costs for laser are $150 and up per session. One reason for the expense is the cost of the laser.

In spring, as summer approaches and we shed winter clothing, everyone thinks more of physical appearance. Makeup will mask skin disorders; lasers and sclerotherapy may eliminate them.

Dr. Wolgelernter's Laser Medical Centre, the first established clinic of its kind in Toronto, is still the most up-to-date. His vascular laser, the kind which is used at the Hospital for Sick Children, is safe for infants.

He has taught other physicians from Canada, the U.S. and Europe. Dr. Wolgelernter has been on TV, radio and has had numerous articles in the newspaper written about his centre.

Dr. Wolgelernter is also experienced in performing collagen injections for lines, wrinkles, scars and giving lips a more fuller appearance. The clinic also uses glycolic acid for facial peels, giving one a more healthier complexion. His patients include actors and TV personalities and patients from across Canada.

To Life...

Fitness One on One

Fitness One On One is for men and women who already take care of themselves and want to go further. The program has two parts: gym training, directed by founder Mark Kehr, and nutrition/weight loss/stress management coaching by Rob Sugar.

Gym training is one-on-one with a personal trainer, an intense one-hour workout by appointment, with no more than five people in the gym at once. Trainers' backgrounds range from phys. ed. graduates to certified personal trainers.

Sugar, a certified neuro-linguistic programmer with ten years' experience, considers nutrition as vital as exercise. He gives his clients ongoing support, calling daily, visiting, grocery shopping and planning restaurant excursions with them. He strives to motivate them to make lifestyle changes which bring lasting changes in how people look and feel.

Sugar advocates natural foods, and paying attention to how you combine them. He begins by gently cleansing and revitalizing the digestive system. With toxins in your system, performance and appearance suffer, no matter what you eat or how you exercise; you won't have a flat stomach until the system has been cleaned out. Then, hips, thighs, buttocks and stomach not only fit better into clothes, but you feel better.

To keep to a diet in the long haul, you must love each meal. Most of us eat mainly in order to feel good, and need to combine enjoyment and nutrition. Therefore, each diet respects individual preferences and lifestyle. A career woman with children, for example, has different needs from a single woman with no children.

Our relationship with food is the most intimate of all. An infant's two basic needs, food and love, are satisfied together through feeding by the mother, whose love is unconditional. As we grow older, these needs persist, but love becomes conditional. If the needs are unfulfilled, and we try to replace love with food, it can become addictive. While other addictions like tobacco can be cured, we can't stop eating. We can, however, change our awareness of what we eat and why.

Deprivation diets fail because if "food is love", they ask us to renounce love. After depriving themselves, people compensate by food binges. Besides making them feel guilty, binges disrupt their metabolism, making it even harder to lose weight. To make lifestyle changes, however, requires not guilt but self-esteem, and the will to grow from dependency on externals to self-support from within. If we love ourselves, we motivate ourselves to change.

Besides promoting public awareness of the need for self-esteem, Sugar works with emotions and stress management. His mentors include Eli Bay of Relaxation Response Centre, Dr. Joe Goodman and Dr. Barbara Forest of Lifespace Institute. Micheal Sugar, Rob's father has been one of his greatest supporters. Some of Rob's clients include Dini Petty and Robert Gage.

Cost for personal training starts at approximately $40. per session. Nutrition, weight loss and/or stress management programs are designed exclusively for clients on a one on one basis by Rob Sugar. Complimentary sessions may be available on a limited basis. For information call 469-5002.

The Silk Plant Lady

The Silk Plant Lady, Adriana Haberman (905-731-9894), is a centerpiece designer with an artist's perspective. A former student of New York's Parsons School of Design, she focuses on glamour and color coordination with the aim of producing a dazzling effect.

Haberman uses silk flowers in her centerpieces, which allows her to match the colors to the wedding colors. Exact matches, she said, can not always be made with natural flowers, but for the head table she recommends a combination of naturals and silks.

She said silks can almost duplicate nature. "When you look at something I've made, you have to look three times to see if it is real or not."

For clients who want something different, she will fashion an art deco centerpiece out of black, white, silver, gold- and bronze-colored silk flowers. Or she can add candles or just about any kind of Papier Maché animals / birds to match a party theme.

Since guests and party givers take the centerpieces home, the silks will remind them of the party long after it is over.

Haberman is also available to drape synagogue aisles with chiffon and decorate the hall. "When the lights go on and people come into a room, it's showtime!" Haberman said.

Depending on the client's budget Haberman can enhance any hall with decorated chairs, ice sculptures or interior waterfalls. She said she has created a Hawaiin theme with silk trees, a night-club and a tropical garden for past clients. "You literally can create dreams and make them come true. My satisfaction is hearing gasps of admiration from the wedding party and crowd."

The Silk Plant Lady is available for parties, bar and bat mitzvahs, as well as weddings.

The "Everything Pencil" for beauty over

The Everything Pencil was invented by Judith August, a former model who created her own line of corrective cosmetics. This multi-purpose tool is recommended by top plastic surgeons, their patients, cosmeticians and dermatologists.

The Pencil slides, without caking; it contains vitamins E and A to promote healing. It covers under-eye circles, bruises, pigment spots and broken capillaries, smooths lines, covers acne without aggravating it, blends varicose veins and birthmarks, and can be used on all areas. It can also hide incisions after plastic surgery or a peel. A bit bigger than a crayon, it slips easily into a handbag.

The Everything Pencil's three distinct tones may be used together. Light, for fair skin, highlights facial areas and fills in fine lines. Medium is for most skin tones, as well as chest pigmentations, under-eye puffiness, spots and broken capillaries. Dark is for tanned or olive skin, and contours on a light complexion.

A corrective tip:

To eliminate under-eye puffiness, choose a color one to two shades darker than foundation. Apply to puffed areas. Fill in dark line underneath puff with color two shades lighter. Keep puffy area darker, line lighter. Do this over foundation; set in powder.

Rhonda Goldberg, an esthetician and cosmetician for 20 years, does glamour and corrective makeup, facials, manicures and pedicures. She recommends the Everything Pencil above all other cover sticks. Goldberg also retails Shabbat makeup.

Phone (905) 886-7754 or (905) 881-2717; no Shabbat calls please.

Don't hate it, hide it . . . ב"ה

R U Kiddin'?

This is a new, home-based company, started on April 1st. Owner Karen Adler, after 15 years' retail experience, left the corporate world in order to be a mother and still run a business. The new life is both challenging and satisfying. She attributes much of her success to support from her husband and their two children, who also helped design Bob, the environmentally conscious company mascot.

R U Kiddin'? retails heavy-duty sweatsuits and T-shirts, mail-order and delivery, for kids two to 16. Their sweatsuits are 18 ounce fleece, with cotton-polyester facing for durability and cotton backing for comfort; their T-shirts are 100 percent cotton. Their products are stronger, and their average price 25 percent lower than their competitors'.

Recycled materials are used for packaging, and for making the free knee patches that go with each sweatsuit. R U Kiddin'? has a hand-me-down policy as well. Bring in one outgrown R U Kiddin' sweatsuit, and you get a 10 percent discount towards the purchase of a new one. On the customer's behalf, the old one is donated to a women's shelter.

Adler also does hats and T-shirts for Bar and Bat Mitzvahs, Corporations and Charities. For information please call 787-0231.

Noah's Natural Foods: Products for all your health food needs

Noah's Natural Foods, at 322 Bloor St. W. for over 13 years, now has a second location at 2395 Yonge St. Both stores offer one of Toronto's largest selections of natural foods, vitamins, supplements, herbs and body care products. Each store is over 3000 square feet offering you the best quality, selection and price for all your health food needs. Knowledgeable, trained staff are always available to discuss your cosmetic or vitamin needs. Noah's success proves that a healthier lifestyle is gaining popularity.

Those with sensitive skin or chemical allergies will benefit from the variety of body care products, produced without animal testing, chemicals or preservatives. For aching muscles, Israel's Dead Sea Bath Salts are a favorite. Noah's also boasts the best vitamin selection and prices. Herbs, used for thousands of years for many ailments, are available in liquid extracts or capsules.

Over 300 bulk foods are available: sugarless candies, dried fruit, nuts, flours, beans, seeds, pastas and grind-your-own peanut butter. Cooking and salad oils include safflower, olive, macadamia and canola, all non-hydrogenated. There is a full selection of organic produce grown without pesticides or chemicals. When you taste organic vegetables or fruit, the real taste comes out.

For people who want to keep healthy while on the run, there are frozen vegetarian entrees ready to pop in the oven. A kamut pasta dinner with tomato sauce, mushrooms and vegetables goes great with fruit and vegetable juices from Noah's.

Many products at Noah's are kosher. Look for the symbol on the packaging.

Refreshing Crystal Springs

Cool, pure, refreshing, thirst-quenching - what more could one want from bottled water? Well, with Crystal Springs bottled water there's even more.

Crystal Springs is Canada's largest and oldest bottled water company, founded in 1963. The water source is in Cataract, Ontario, from underground springs in the beautiful Caledon Hills north of Toronto.

This has been a continuous source of pure water since 1883. It is the original source for the world- famous Canada Dry products.

Crystal Springs is available through most stores in various sizes, and in home delivery in the 18 litre bottle and 11 litres. Crystal Springs is also available in the United States, under the trade name Northern Crystal. It is primarily available in Florida, where many of Crystal's loyal customers spend the winter months, so watch for it there too.

The company is proud of its close relationship with the Jewish community, getting involved with many charitable events in the Jewish market.

Purity is the byword for Crystal Springs. There are stringent quality control standards, with samples taken every two hours.

But the most important part of Crystal Springs is, pure and simple. the terrific taste: as their motto says, "taste you can trust."

TO LIFE...

Celebrate the good times with foods you enjoy

It's your birthday and your mother-in-law has made a triple-layer, chocolate fudge cake in honour of this special day. As one who is generally conscious of eating well, should you:

A. Politely refuse to taste it?

B. Let your guard down just this time so you don't insult your mother-in-law, g-d forbid?

C. Take a slice and enjoy!?

If you chose (C), congratulations! When you follow Canada's Food Guide To Healthy Eating, it's perfectly okay to indulge in rich foods once in a while.

Life is meant to be celebrated. It's designed for us to enjoy. If you deprive yourself of special treats, then you deprive yourself of great fun and pleasure too.

"Celebrations are about eating well with family and friends, not about starving ourselves or depriving ourselves of food that we enjoy," says Dietitian and Nutritionist Alysse M. Fogel. "Never feel guilty when you have that piece of birthday cake. And don't fret if you tend to eat more on such occasions. It's the foods you eat on a regular basis, and over the long run, that determine if you're eating well."

The key to eating well - as set out in Canada's Food Guide to Healthy Eating - is not to give up the foods you love for the sake of your health. Instead, you should aim for variety and moderation by:

- Enjoying a variety of foods.
- Emphasizing cereals, breads, other grain products, vegetables and fruits.
- Choosing lower-fat dairy proucts, leaner meats and foods prepared with little or no fat.
- Achieving and maintaining a healthy body weight by enjoying regular physical activity and healthy eating.
- Limiting salt, alcohol and caffeine.

When we reach personal milestones such as birthdays and anniversaries, and when we gather with our family for holidays and Shabbat dinner each week, we tend to make festive meals - and rich desserts - the focal point of such occasions. According to Fogel, we should "relax and enjoy the special times, remembering to balance higher fat choices over the course of the week."

Also remember that there are simple ways to cut back on our intake of fat while still enjoying rich and delicious foods. One way is to use table spreads such as Fleischmann's® SALT FREE margarine. It's the only non-hydrogenated brand available on the market that is Pareve, Kosher and lactose-free. It makes a great choice for quality, for good taste and for the way we want to live today.

Fleischmann's Takes A New Look At The Way We're Living.

At Fleischmann's, we believe that life is meant to be enjoyed. It's about having a hearty laugh. Celebrating good times with family and friends. And taking time out for what counts the most - you and your own healthy pleasures.

We've taken a new look at the way we're living in the 90's. And we invite you to share in our new approach - it's about living for today.

Vacations in Texas let families mosey up to fun-filled pastimes

TEXAS — On your next family vacation, check into the many exciting attractions Texas offers.

No matter what holiday activities your children enjoy most — exploring museums, enjoying amusement parks, observing the animal kingdom, or hiking through natural park and wildlife reserves — you'll find the perfect family vacation in Texas.

To answer children's constant "Why?" take your family to Texas museums. Explore everything from the earth and the ocean to deep space. In Houston, the Children's Museum encourages visitors to learn about history, culture, science and the arts through interactive exhibits and activities, such as How Does It Work? The Science Behind the Automobile. At Insights — El Paso Science Centre, educational displays about science and technology provide an opportunity for entertaining, hands-on experience with solar power, space science, energy, and the human body.

At the Texas State Aquarium in Corpus Christi, children can pet a shark and get close to birds, rays and tropical fish that inhabit the waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

Youngsters who dream of landing a space shuttle, touching a moon rock, or meeting an astronaut can do just that at Space Centre Houston, located next to Johnson Space Centre. After this glimpse of the future, travel to the past at the Depot Museum and Children's Discovery Centre in Henderson. The restored 1901 railroad depot has more than 200 exhibits with century-old memorabilia, a log cabin, and a restored caboose for train lovers.

In keeping with the current dinosaur craze, Texas offers several activities for future geologists. Children can become amateur paleontologists and dig for dinosaur bones at the Fort Worth Museum of Science and History's Dino-Dig exhibit. DinoDig includes a large outdoor discovery area with three dig sites, as well as life-sized representations of dinosaurs. For a look at actual dinosaur tracks, travel to Dinosaur Valley State Park in Glen Rose, just south of Dallas, where the first sauropod tracks ever discovered lie just under the clear waters of the Paluxy River. Exhibits and interpretive maps speculate about the life of these early Texas inhabitants. Those visiting downtown San Antonio can meet with a life-like Tyrannosaurus Rex in the new animatronic lobby of Ripley's Believe It or Not! The attraction also features a new Dinosaur Expedition gallery.

Texans are famous for their fun-loving nature, so it's no surprise that amusement parks are found in almost every region of the state. Six Flags Over Texas, in Arlington near Dallas, has rides such as the Shock Wave, a steel double loop roller, and the Texas Chute Out, a free-fall parachute drop.

The Rattler

In San Antonio, the party never stops at Fiesta Texas. Each of the park's areas reflects an aspect of Texas culture and history and provides the setting for eight daily live musical productions. After the shows, visitors can take a hair-raising ride on The Rattler, one of the world's tallest, fastest wooden roller coasters. San Antonio is also the home of Sea World of Texas, famous for Shamu, the killer whale, and such attractions as waterskiing shows, giant aquariums, and a dolphin petting tank.

AstroWorld/WaterWorld in Houston is a combination theme park and water park. AstroWorld has the world's first stand-up roller coaster and WaterWorld showcases water slides, surfing, and a water play area. Another waterpark not to be missed is Schlitterbahn Resorts and Waterpark. Located in New Braunfels, Schlitterbahn remains one of the largest water theme parks in the country, with 17 waterslides, nine major tubes chutes, and three areas designed specifically for younger patrons. If you're in the Texas Panhandle, stop in Amarillo to enjoy Wonderland Park, Texas' third largest amusement park — more than 21 rides, miniature golf, arcades, bumper cars, a haunted house, and concession stands galore.

Texas zoos house animal species from around the world. The Gladys Porter Zoo in Brownsville, one of the top 10 zoos in the United States in size and diversity of exhibits, has eliminated the bars and cages of traditional zoos and created moats and waterways to define the animals' living areas. At the Discovery Centre in the Abilene Zoo birds and mammals from Texas and Africa are seen in simulated natural habitats of water, grassland, forest, desert, and woodland. How can you combine a trip to Texas with a tour of Africa? Board the monorail through the Dallas Zoo's Wilds of Africa rain forest area. Also in this region is Fossil Rim Wildlife Centre, which protects more than 1,000 endangered species. These animals roam freely on 3,000 acres of prairie with a nine-mile automobile route guiding visitors. Not to be left out, Lubbock's Mackenzie Park claims fame for Prairie Dog Town, one of the few remaining colonies of prairie dogs in the United States.

Texas also offers an astounding array of natural wonders. Wonder World in San Marcos boasts a 30-million-year-old cavern and an anti-gravity house. Palestine's Texas State Railroad and State Historical Park offer a train ride through the longest and narrowest park in Texas. From another train ride — around the bottom of a 1,100 foot deep canyon at Palo Duro Canyon State Park — children can view the ancient chiseled rock faces that tower above them.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Haliburton's PineStone Resort: It's always good to see holiday resorts do everything in their power to cater to Jewish visitors. Sometimes, however, even the best laid plans go awry. Staff at PineStone Resort and Conference Centre in Haliburton had done tremendous research to meet the strict rabbinical requirements of kashruth in preparation for a group last Passover.

"Unfortunately, at the last moment, we were notified by Ambassador Tours that they were choosing to cancel the whole week, which left people with no plans for Passover," Anne Axler Larcade, director of hotel operations, informed us recently by letter.

She continued: "PineStone Resort would like to thank all of those individuals, couples and families that expressed an interest in spending Passover with us, and we regret any inconvenience that has been caused. PineStone was in no way involved in the decision to cancel this week. As a member of the Jewish community, I am sensitive to the role Passover plays, particularly the seders, in Jewish family life. We look forward to hosting the Jewish community, especially CJN readers, in the future."

Magical Mystery Tour: This summer marks the 25th anniversary of The Beatles' Abbey Road album, and the crossing where the famous cover photograph was taken is an important stop on two Beatle Walks of London. Beatles fan-club president Richard Porter leads four walks each week.

The Magical Mystery Tour includes the Apple offices where they last played live, and the site of the gallery where John Lennon met Yoko Ono. The Beatles London Town Walk includes the registry office where Paul McCartney and Ringo Starr were married to their respective spouses. Each walk starts at an Underground station, lasts about two hours, and costs about $8. Contact London Walks, 071-624-3978.

Singapore Sling: Despite the Michael Fay caning incident, you're probably safer in Singapore than in most foreign destinations (unless, of course, you like to spray-paint cars).

According to the 1993 World Competitiveness Report, which is based on survey of 37 developed and newly industrialized countries, Singapore ranks at the top in safety, security and stability.

The report identifies Singapore as the country where people have the highest level of confidence in the justice system and the greatest public support for government policies. Singapore tied for first place with Japan in the 'work attitude' category, based on its lack of alcohol and drug problems in the workplace.

Tall Ships in Toronto: It is nothing less than "the most formidable gathering of sailing vessels ever held on the Great Lakes since at least the War of 1812." That's according to William Boyle, general manager of Harbourfront Centre, which is hosting Sail Toronto 1994 from June 29 to July 4.

Between those dates, some 25 majestic brigs, schooners and seaway-sized ships from as far away as Hawaii, England and Poland will sweep into Toronto harbour for a six-day festival celebrating the romantic age of sail. Boarding passes are available for $7. A Canada Day fireworks display, synchronized to Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, is planned. The grand finale is set for noon on July 4, when Toronto bids farewell to the fleet.

Stirling Renaissance Festival: Roughly 75 minutes by car from Rochester or Syracuse, the Lake Ontario town of Stirling, N.Y., is hosting its 18th annual Renaissance Festival from July 2 through August 14.

A serene glade in the verdant countryside of Cayuga County becomes a picturesque renaissance village, celebrating a visit by Queen Elizabeth I and all her lords and ladies. Jousting, Shakespearean comedy, courtly dances, duels with swords or battle-axes and other Elizabethan thrills are yours to enjoy. Meet a genuine knight in shining armour.

London Accommodation: Uptown Reservations offers exclusive bed-and-breakfast lodgings in private host homes in fashionable central London areas like Kensington, Chelsea, Knightsbridge and Belgravia. More than half of Uptown's clients are women, who prefer the more secure environments and neighbourhoods where it is safe to walk at night. Clients also the prefer the more hospitable, personalized service than might be found at a standard hotel. Uptown Reservations, 50 Christchurch Street, London SW3 4AR. Mississippi Riverboat Gambling: Ontario's first gambling casino recently opened in Windsor, so now's a good time to mention the Queen of New Orleans, a 19th-century riverboat casino that plies the Mississippi River near the colourful Louisiana port of New Orleans. Besides slot machines, video poker and gaming tables, the paddlewheeler offers a unique scenic tour of the city, with an historical narration and live Dixieland Jazz.

A $55-million venture of the Hilton hotel chain, the ship presently operating is an interim model, to be replaced by a larger vessel with a capacity of 2,400 persons in November.

Religious artifacts in exhibit

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yeshiva University Museum in New York, in co-operation with the Jewish community of Dubrovnik, is staging an exhibition of religious artifacts from that Croatian seaside town.

The exhibit includes a rare Torah scroll that dates back to the 13th century, as well as rimonim, Torah crowns and a variety of textiles used in the synagogue. The Torah, which was written in France, was brought to Dubrovnik by Sephardi Jews fleeing the Spanish Inquisition, said Danko Atias, vice-president of Dubrovnik's Jewish community.

Atias, who was in New York to open the exhibition, said Dubrovnik's Jewish community organized the display because "we want to show people we exist and we survive." He said the medieval Dubrovnik synagogue, which houses the artifacts, was badly damaged by an earthquake and by shelling in the warfare that broke out soon after Croatia declared its independence. Since then, the conflict has moved to Bosnia and Dubrovnik has been at peace, Atias said.

Michael Papo, president of the community, said he hopes to stage the exhibit in other Jewish centres, including Toronto, Chicago and Los Angeles, after it concludes its run at Yeshiva University at the end of the year.

The display can be seen at the Yeshiva University Museum, 2520 Amsterdam Ave., New York;

B.C. hotel kitchen goes kosher

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The staid old Empress Hotel, one of the last bastions of what Victorians claim is "a little bit of England," will open a kosher kitchen at the end of May or early in June, food and beverage director Marc Saunier told The CJN.

Saunier said he hopes to be able to provide facilities for simchahs for up to 300 people. The Empress is a CP hotel.

At present, the only Victoria facilities available for kosher events are the synagogue and the Jewish Community Centre, but both have limited seating.

Saunier said he has been negotiating with kashruth authorities in Vancouver and expects to get certification soon.

Although the hotel is an old building, the interior was completely renovated in 1988 at a cost of $40 million and now has couple of unused kitchens which can easily be kashered.

Saunier has worked in hotel kitchens in New York and Montreal. He said he will bring in a mashgiach from Vancouver to supervise. Food supplies will be purchased in Vancouver, Seattle and probably Winnipeg.

Saunier declined to give details of menus, stating these would be discussed first with the rabbis.

The hotel will concentrate on the Vancouver Island market first but hopes to expand to package tours.

Also being considered is the possibility of providing kosher meals to short-term visitors, but Saunier wants to see how the big simchah plan works first.

Saunier was sold on the idea by Stephanie Gilbert after she staged a successful Hadassah-WIZO Chocolate Sunday at the hotel. She's convinced there's plenty of kashruth business available for the hotel and says an October wedding is already being planned. "The Empress will be seeing a lot more of the Jewish community in the future," she predicted.

Meanwhile, Vancouver will get another kosher kitchen in the new Wall Centre Garden, now under construction. It will have a "dedicated" kitchen which won't have to be kashered every time there's a kosher event. The only other hotels offering kosher service in Vancouver are the Four Seasons and the Hyatt Regency. The Hyatt has joined with a Richmond synagogue to hold monthly kosher public dinners which have proved very successful, The CJN was told.

Young pianist set to hit Toronto stage

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — May 30 will be a special evening for Thornhill resident Ori Friedman at North York Recital Hall.

Just 11 years old, the young pianist will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto with the National Chamber Orchestra of Canada conducted by Dr. Alexander Weinstangel. The concert marks his orchestral debut.

Ori, a Grade 6 student, starting studying the piano seriously two years ago. He likes to ride his bike, watch TV, read books, skate, fish and play with his friends, but wears gloves to protect his hands.

Ori and his younger sister, Natalie, are the children of Gabriel and Ilana Friedman who immigrated from Israel 3½ years ago. Gabriel Friedman is a violinist and professional music teacher.

"It's amazing how he can sight read music and remember it, like a professional musician," said his father and teacher. "After just one year of study, he could play a complete Mozart concerto.

Ori Friedman

Friedman senior said it was difficult allowing his son to pursue a career as a pianist because the music business is hard, "but Ori loves it. I've never had a student like him — his musicality, his artistic expression, the theory he has mastered in such a short time, the fact that he sees pictures when he plays. Maybe we've made a mistake; it would have been easier for him to become an engineer or a doctor."

His mother says she sometimes feels Ori is not her child, "especially when I see him perform."

Ori himself says he was always fascinated with music and instruments. "In kindergarten, an accordionist came to play and sing for us, and I wanted an accordion."

Then on a class trip to Toronto's Casa Loma he became entranced with the big pipe organ. His father suggested he learn to play the piano. "At first it was a little keyboard with 49 keys, but when he saw how fast I learned, I moved to bigger electric pianos. Now that we live in a house instead of a condominium, we can have a real grand piano."

Not only did the youngster earn his Royal Conservatory of Music Grade 8 piano with first class honors after absorbing the theory in only three months, he has competed in Kiwanis Festivals against older pianists and walked off with the prizes.

When asked how he approaches a piece of music, Ori articulates clearly how he makes piano playing a very personal experience.

'Give feeling to a piece'

"First I learn the notes; then I give feeling to a piece by seeing images or moods. For example, in the Emperor, there's one part that I see as one hand chasing the other, or in the second movement, it's very emotional — not passionate — but a slow and calm emotion. No one tells me what to do with a piece; I take their advice into consideration, but I play the music the way I want to interpret it."

Among his favorite pianists are Brendel, Ashkenazy and Rubenstein. As for composers, Ori admits he is a romantic and so is drawn to Chopin, Beethoven, Lizst and Grieg.

Conductor Weinstengel learned about Ori from the boy's ballet teacher. "Ori has a heaven-given talent that happens once in a century, if that often. The strength and suppleness of his technique and the maturity of musicianship are astonishing."

Weinstengel is just one of a number of people who have rallied around Ori and his talent. Actress Kitty Carlisle Hart saw a video of his performance and may be arranging a full scholarship to the Julliard School.

"I see a life of hard work ahead for me, but I'm willing to do the hours of practising because I love to perform," Ori says.

Spies by Ernest Volkman Wiley $32.50

Spying has been called the world's second oldest profession. More than 5,000 years ago an Egyptian king hit upon the idea of concealing men inside flour sacks to spy on the besieged city of Jaffa. Hebrew scriptures record that Moses as well as Joshua despatched spies to bring back reports about the promised land.

In the 20th century — a time marked by almost continual war — armies of spies have been deployed and activated to serve the needs of antagonistic or suspicious nations. At the height of the Cold War it is estimated that the Soviet Union employed 200,000 spies; only a slightly smaller number were used by the United States.

Espionage, a former director of the CIA once remarked, "is not a game for Archbishops." But it is a widely played game and its participants have been alternately reviled and honored, rewarded and ignored, praised and disowned. It is ironic that the spies who receive the most publicity and whose efforts are lauded are those who are caught; the more successful spies remain unheralded and unsung.

Ernest Volkman has been a journalist for more than 35 years and a longtime student of espionage — a subject on which he has written hundreds of articles and several books. "Spies" describes the activities of forty-five or so moles, defectors, traitors and spymasters, all of them practitioners of the "Black Art," whose feats of espionage — for better or worse — have irrevocably altered the fate of empires, nations — and perhaps history itself.

These concise sketches are informative, well written, and often exciting. We learn about such diverse characters as Eric Ericson, an American businessman, who, posing as a Swedish Nazi, helped to block the flow of oil to Hitler's war machine; Richard Sorge, whose intelligence gathering operation in Japan balked Germany's attempt to seize Moscow; Amy Thorpe, the beautiful American debutante, who was transformed into a super spy; Karl Fuchs, the man who stole the atomic bomb; Giovanni Montini, who as Pope Paul VI, performed many valuable services for American intelligence, and Whittaker Chambers who is described as "the man with two faces."

Canadians will recall the case of Igor Gouzenko, who was assigned to the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa and whose defection in 1945 resounded like a thunderclap across the Western world.

Readers of the CJN will be especially interested in the depictions of Israel Beer, Wolfgang Lotz and Eliyahu Cohen.

Beer, a close friend of David Ben Gurion, occupied a high position in Israel's military and intelligence establishment. He was in charge of keeping Ben Gurion's personal diary, which exposed him to an astonishing range of secrets. In 1959 through a variety of clues and revelations, Beer was unmasked as a Russian agent. Subsequent investigation revealed that the real Beer — whoever he was — was long dead and that his namesake in Israel had adroitly assumed his identity.

Wolfgang Lotz was the intrepid Israeli spy who posed as a wealthy German rancher in Egypt and skilfully managed to send detailed information back home about German rocket scientists in Egypt and the country's military installations and intelligence. Israel's lightning victory in the Six Day War was to a large degree the result of this valuable data. Eventually discovered by the Egyptians, Lotz was exchanged in 1967 for 500 Egyptian soldiers.

Cohen, assuming the identity of a wealthy Syrian businessman, went to Damascus where he soon made a number of influential friends. In time, he was able to provide Israeli intelligence with full information about the defences of the Golan Heights and even the names of all the pilots in the Syrian Air Force. When his true identity came to light in 1945 the infuriated Syrians had him publicly hanged.

This wide-ranging, informative survey of modern espionage is of unfailing interest.

Cassette disappoints

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

I may be jaundiced, but when I think of wedding music, words like "joyful" and "zesty" come to mind.

Slow, spiritual music seems misplaced on such a happy occasion.

But that's exactly what's offered on The Jewish Wedding Album, a new cassette issued by Intersound of Toronto.

The problem is not so much in the choice of music as in the style in which it is rendered.

Nancy Enslin's harp, while melodic and lofty, is a tad too ethereal for a wedding feast. Perhaps it is more appropriate for the ceremony itself.

Occasionally accompanied by soprano Deborah Benardot, Enslin plays 24 compositions, ranging from Jerusalem of Gold and Bashana Haba-A to Endless Love and Simon Tov.

It's fine, soothing, relaxing music, but it lacks punch and joie de vivre.

Jordan hits high notes with concert, recording

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Joanna Jordan, who performed at Harbourfront's du Maurier Theatre this week, sold her co-op apartment in Toronto's Forest Hill neighborhood in order to afford what she considered an absolute necessity of her craft: a new Lyon Healy electric harp, costing $23,000.

"I wound up buying a cheaper place in Mississauga. I literally had to sell my home in order to buy my harp," says the accomplished musician, who used to join the orchestra in the Royal York's Imperial Room on occasion to play for the likes of Ella Fitzgerald and Tony Bennett.

Jordan's Harbourfront performance — "my first really big concert" — coincided with the release of her debut recording, a CD called Clazzic. It features a dozen musical selections ranging from classical to jazz, which Jordan plays on her new electric harp, accompanied by the bass, guitar and drums of the Clazz Trio.

Jordan agrees that those instruments are more typically found in a jazz-blues combo. "I'm replacing the piano player," she says. The harp, she says, has come a long way since originating eons ago as a simple bow and arrow, to which additional strings were added to make a lyre.

"At the time of Bach and baroque music, the harp almost became extinct until the romantic era because it couldn't keep up with the very chromatic music of the time. They began renovating the harp into instruments like the harpsichord, clavichord, piano and organ, which enabled musicians to play the chromatic music that was being written back then."

According to Jordan, the pedal harp was an innovation of the romantic era, and permitted harpists to change keys easily to expand their range. An innovation of our electronic-technological age, the electric harp allows harpists to perform in the recording studio without the clatter of noisy pedals, she says.

In her 20 years of playing the harp, Jordan has acquired a wide repertoire that includes Jewish music, folk, jazz, rock, pop and classical.

Her concert included a musical trip around the world, featuring sounds associated with such places as the American deep South, Russia, Spain, Tunisia and other spots.

"One day I'll probably do something in the genre of beautiful New Age relaxation music with a Jewish root behind it," she says.

In her own way, Jordan pays homage to two of the world's most famous harpists, both of whom were Jewish. Part of her concert involved a routine in which she dressed like the musical screen star Harpo Marx and performed his spoof of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody Number 2 from A Night in Casablanca.

And on a chain around her neck is a Star of David with a harp in the center. "Everyone asks if I had it specially made, and I say, 'No, King David was a harpist.' He played the music to soothe the soul of Saul. There are many references to his harp in the Bible."

As a performer, Jordan seems as diverse as her instrument. Capable of giving Prokofiev and Faure the respect they deserve, she can also swing with the likes of Charlie Parker and Thelonious Monk, and demonstrates keen humor with her upbeat rendition of Stephen Foster's Swannee River.

"I can play serious classical music but I also like to have fun," she explains. "I sort of go the whole rainbow."

Past, present merged in film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The title of Henry Raymon's absorbing documentary, They were Neighbors, succinctly says it all.

Raymon's 45-minute film — which was recently screened at the Art Gallery of Ontario under the auspices of the Goethe Institute and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee — is about the merging of the past with the present.

Two German students, pointedly the only ones in their history class, accompany a contemporary on a journey of discovery.

The students are Martin and Susanne. Their guide is Peter Schwiertz, a Jew born and raised in Germany.

They visit sites of Jewish interest in Franconia and speak to an assortment of people there, including Peter's parents.

By doing so, Martin and Susanne delve into vanished and revived Jewish communities about which they know very little.

Peter, in turn, learns that some Germans appreciate the Jewish presence in Germany.

In Wurzburg, they're taken to a 15th century mikvah in the basement of St. Mary's church, built on the site of a destroyed synagogue.

Peter's parents report they have no "problems" with their German neighbors. His mother, a German convert to Judaism, says they live "normally."

But, as Peter's father intimates, things can never be the same again after the Third Reich and the Holocaust.

He perceives himself as a "Jew in Germany" rather than as a German Jew. He doesn't consider Germany "his land," and looks to Israel as the "ultimate place of security."

After a conversation with Martin's parents, they attend a synagogue service, during which Peter explains the rituals.

Martin takes Peter to a cathedral decorated with a menorah, and the pastor expounds on Christianity's spiritual debt to Judaism.

With the tour over, Peter observes, "We now know a little more about each other."

Yes, but only the surface has been scratched.

Chutzpadik comic takes aim at politics

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Jackie Mason is a short, wistful looking comic with a sallow complexion and thinning ginger hair touched with gray. His bulging eyes have tired pouches, showing the strain of 30 years in the firing line of comedy.

This resilient comic, who writes all of his own material, can currently be found strutting and mugging his stuff in an all new one-man Broadway show, Jackie Mason: Politically Incorrect.

For more than two hours his punchlines and staccato delivery focus on one of his central passions — politics.

Setting himself up as a defender of free speech (before a backdrop of an abstract Stars and Stripes), he satirizes U.S. President Bill Clinton, Jews, blacks, gays, reverse discrimination, the Bobbitt trial, the Menendez brothers and the women's lib movement in his no-holds barred style. When audience reception thins out, he laughs at himself. "Who am I talking to?" is a much used line for dead spots.

I must confess there was a time when I was dismayed by Mason's brand of humor, but I have learned to admire his ability to handle controversial and tricky issues, especially in the light of the growing volume of scatological, tasteless material now polluting the marketplace. Mason spills his truths like a Jewish Mark Twain, with sharpness, pungency and brilliant timing.

Jackie Mason

On employer difficulty in firing an ethnic employee: "If you hire a female black homosexual, you might as well close your doors right away."

On women in the Clinton administration, focusing on Attorney General Janet Reno: "They don't look like women."

He yearns for the days when a woman would let you call her Sweetheart and gays didn't demand to march in your parade.

As great a stand-up comedian as he is, he has one salient weakness: he has trouble reading and performing dialogue not written by himself. This was evidenced in recent years by failed feature movies and TV sitcoms.

But Brooklyn-born Mason touches a special chord with New York audiences, who clearly adore his chutzpadik style. The box office at the Golden Theatre can be expected to continue to hum for months to come.

Appearing at the Golden Theatre, 252 West 45th Street. For tickets call TeleCharge Today: (212) 239-6200.

Touches special chord

On politicians: "They have a dangerous job — they never know when they'll get caught."

On Clinton and his smoking marijuana without inhaling: "Would you put a pastrami sandwich in your mouth if you weren't going to swallow it?"

Firm announces new kosher products

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Take a young, aggressive, family-oriented Toronto company that is totally committed to the highest standards of kashruth, quality control, and cleanliness.

Put them together with an American meat supplier with the same standards and qualities.

What you get is Lazar Yitzchock, a glatt kosher wholesale food service that has recently appeared on the Toronto scene.

The Bielak family has been involved in the meat packing business for over 50 years. Now the current generation, Robert, Marilyn, Sylvia, Anita and Faigie, with the support and advice of their mother Marsha, has taken over and is establishing what they call the Kosher Experience.

Agri Food Processors of Postville, Iowa, which is under the supervision of K'Hal Adas Jeshurun-Breuer's, is also a family operated business, owned by the Rubashkin family. A grandson, Jeff Schochet, is the general manager of Lazar Yitzchok.

Lazar Yitzchok is also under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. All the meat is glatt kosher, and is soaked and salted.

Sylvia Bielak, who is responsible for sales, new product development and marketing research, acts as spokesman for the company.

She said that she saw a need for a company to put out first-rate kosher meat products, while still adhering to the highest standards of quality and cleanliness.

Schochet explained that Agri Processors is the only kosher slaughterhouse that performs schechitah according to the strictest rules of the Shulchan Aruch, the Code of Jewish Law, schechitah munachas.

"The animal walks right into a box, which is then gently turned upside down. The schochet can use a downward motion to kill the animal, which causes it less pain and exerts no physical pressure which can cause bruising and render it non-kosher."

Cuts of beef, lamb and veal are shipped from Agri to Lazar Yitzchock's new, state of the art meat packing facility in North York, where they are ground or cut into roasts, chops, strips or whatever is required, vacuum packed and labelled, and shipped to customers.

Because the standards of cleanliness are so high, Sylvia Bielak explained, the shelf life of the packaged meat is longer.

The family is not content merely to provide Toronto with what Sylvia calls "excellent, beautiful kosher meat."

She is planning a whole line of new kosher products, beginning with Aaron's (named after Aaron Rubashkin) hot dogs, pastrami, corn beef, salami, and beef sticks, which will be sold in supermarkets in the kosher refrigerated section.

They will be distributing Mon Cuisine — frozen, microwavable entrees from Meal Mart in New York, including such selections as radiatore bolognese, salisbury steak in sherry wine sauce, linguine and oriental chicken.

Masha's Gourmet food products (named for mother Marsha) will be a line of prepared foods, such as cabbage rolls, carrot tzimmes, knishes, salads and kugels.

At the moment, their meat is sold through Miracle Food Mart stores and certain caterers, but Sylvia Bielak is anxious to expand.

"We are young, aggressive, tough; we have ideas. We are willing to work from three in the morning to eleven at night to get the business going."

Retail Growth Survey

JERUSALEM — Despite several recent reports on slower economic activity in the first quarter of the year, the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce published a survey showing continued growth in the retail and service sectors.

According to the survey that included 50 companies, economic activity measured in sales volume rose 8 per cent in real terms during the first quarter. The federation reported that based on the findings, the stock market's downturn and the closure of the territories have yet to have an impact on economic activity.

Recently, the Bank of Israel's quarterly company survey indicated that retail activity slowed down in the first quarter, despite Pesach purchases and the growth in credit purchases.

By contrast, the federation survey reports that economic activity picked up, due to seasonal factors and population growth.

Teva Buys Stake In French Firm

ISRAEL — Teva Pharmaceutical Industries has purchased a 34 per cent stake in the French-based Prographarm International for $6.9 million.

Prographarm, which is engaged in sustained released pharmaceuticals and coding technology, completed the financial year ending March 31, 1994 with $17.5 million in total sales.

Teva told the stock exchange it is already co-operating with Prographarm to develop sustained released pharmaceuticals.

The co-operation has already led to the sale of Diltiazem, which Lemmon Company - Teva's U.S. subsidiary - began marketing at the end of last year, the announcement said.

Teva CEO Eli Hurvitz said the company intends to increase its presence in Western Europe. The company's potential partners are also working with the firm to open up networks in Eastern Europe, said Hurvitz.

Teva completed the year with a rise in net profit to $57.5 million from $31.7 million. Total sales rose to $502 million from $395 million.

Hungarian Firm Signs Deal With Bezek

ISRAEL — Bezek officials signed an agreement recently with the Hungarian national communications company to build infrastructure for providing 100,000 phone lines.

The project, which will be carried out by a company set up by the two partners, will cost $70 million. Bezek will invest the $10 million, will raise with the help of partners co-opted for the deal; the rest will come from the Hungarian government and the World Bank.

Bezek and the Hungarian company, Matav, won an international tender issued by the Hungarian government. Bezek managing director Yitzhak Kaul said at the signing ceremony in Budapest that the project would be the largest ever carried out by Hungary and Israel.

Tips From Pros

By LORNE WOLFSON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The United Nations has declared 1994 as the International Year of the Family. Throughout this year, governments and professionals around the world will be focusing greater attention on the family and its role in society in the coming decade. In Canada, the law affecting families has already undergone substantial evolution in recent years. In this article, I will highlight some of the more significant legal changes that have either occurred or are expected in the near future.

What Is A Family?

Traditionally, Canadian law only recognized legally married spouses and their children to constitute a family. In Ontario, for example, the property equalization provisions of the Family Law Act only apply to a man and woman who are married to each other. For support purposes, however, the statute expands the definition of spouse to include a man and woman who are not married to each other and have cohabited either continuously for a period of not less than three years or in a relationship of some permanence, if they are the natural or adoptive parents of a child.

Effective January 1, 1993, the Income Tax Act was amended to include within the definition of spouse a person of the opposite sex with whom a taxpayer has either cohabited for a period of at least one year or with whom the parties are parents of a child. This change eliminates for tax purposes any distinction between parties who are legally married and those who live in common-law relationships.

In November 1993, the Ontario Law Reform Commission issued a report recommending that the definition of spouse in the Family Law Act be broadened to include heterosexual couples who have cohabited for at least three years or have cohabited in a relationship of some permanence where they are the parents of a child. This change would ensure that common-law spouses would have the same rights and responsibilities as married spouses throughout the entire Family Law Act.

The Law Reform Commission also recommended that certain provisions under the Family Law Act be extended to same-sex couples, including the right to enter into a domestic contract. The commission recommended that any two persons should be permitted to sign a document establishing a registered domestic partnership which would provide to the partners all of the rights and obligations available under the Act.

Obligations Between Family Members

Recent legislation and case law have redefined and generally increased the obligations owed by family members to one another. Examples include the following:

• The Federal Department of Justice has recommended the adoption of child support guidelines in both the Divorce Act and provincial legislation. Those guidelines would establish minimum levels of child support based on the income of the parties and the cost of living in particular areas of the country.

• The Supreme Court of Canada decision in Moge v. Moge has redefined the objectives underlying spousal support in Canadian law. The court acknowledged that parsimonious spousal support awards have contributed to the reality that most husbands are financially better off after a divorce while most wives are significantly worse off. According to the Supreme Court, the objective of spousal support should be to provide compensation for sacrifices made to one's career potential or, alternatively, contributions made to the advancement of the other spouse's career potential.

• Recent amendments to the federal pension benefits legislation and proposed amendments to the Ontario pension legislation will allow pension plan administrators to divide pension plan credits at source and to provide the non-employee spouse with his or her own pension entitlement separate and apart from that of the employee spouse.

• The Family Support Plan Act (enacted in March 1992) provides a scheme whereby support payments are automatically deducted by a payer's employer at source and paid to the Office of the Family Support Plan who, in turn, then pays the funds to the spouse entitled to payment under the court order. Although the Family Support Plan has to date been plagued with administrative difficulties resulting in huge backlogs and delays in enforcement and payment out to recipients, the system does have the promise of eventually restoring needed integrity to the court system.

• Recent case law has redefined the rights of custodial parents. While at one time, a parent who had sole custody could move the child's residence wherever he or she saw fit, a court will now restrict such a move unless the custodial parent can establish that the proposed change is in the child's best interest. Similarly, while it was once thought that a custodial parent had the right to absolutely determine the child's education and religious upbringing, recent case law has acknowledged the right of the non-custodial parent to have input into these decisions and the right to educate the child as to alternative forms of religious belief.

Looking Ahead

The Canadian family has not only survived but has been regenerated in new and varied forms, including those led by common-law spouses, same-sex couples, or single parents. Continued evolution in the fields of property equalization, spousal and child support, and custody and access have served to redefine and generally heighten the obligations owed by family members to one another. It is hoped that the International Year of the Family will focus the attention of both professionals who deal with families and the public at large on the evolution that has occurred to date and the changes that are expected in coming years.

Lorne H. Wolfson, LL.B, LL.M, is the head of the Family Law Department of the Toronto law firm of Torkin, Manes, Cohen & Arbus. Wolfson is a family law practitioner who also does family law mediation and arbitration.

Anti-boycott violations result in more fines

By STEVEN WEISS
Special to The CJN

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration has fined another U.S. business for allegedly assisting in the Arab economic boycott against Israel.

Arab American Bank, a New York-based consortium of 22 Arab, European and U.S. banks, was fined $35,000 by the Commerce Department's Bureau of Export Administration for alleged violations of U.S. anti-boycott laws.

The fine, announced April 21, came a week after the Commerce Department announced penalties against four other companies. The department also recently issued a disturbing report showing boycott activity during the first three months of this year remained steady compared to the same period last year.

The report came as a disappointment to Jewish groups, which had expected a decrease in boycott activity as the result of renewed prospects for peace in the Middle East.

Several Arab countries have led a so-called "primary" boycott of Israeli goods since before the creation of Israel in 1948. The boycott also includes "secondary" and "tertiary" aspects, which place companies doing business with Israel on a blacklist along with companies doing business with blacklisted firms.

President Clinton has frequently used diplomatic channels in pressuring the Arab world to discontinue the secondary and tertiary aspects of the boycott, which seriously hamper several U.S. corporations.

Congress has also acted with several bills designed to thwart boycott activity.

A statement on the report released recently by the Commerce Department's Office of Antiboycott Compliance said the Clinton administration would continue pressing for an end to the boycott, acknowledging progress on that front has been "disappointingly slow."

In its announcement of the latest fine, the Commerce Department alleged that the Arab American Bank furnished Syria, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates with information on other companies' business relationships with Israel and other blacklisted entities.

While agreeing to pay the fine, the Arab American Bank neither admitted nor denied the alleged violations of anti-boycott laws, which prohibit the release of information about any person's business relationships with or in a boycotted country.

Other fines assessed recently include $31,200 against Arab Bank PLC of New York; $10,000 against Boaleeco, a Massachusetts manufacturer of educational equipment; and $2,000 against each of two Honeywell Inc. subsidiaries.

More than $6.8 million in penalties were imposed in fiscal year 1993 for alleged boycott activity.

Skills training program in B.C.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A new skills training program "to give students, workers and the unemployed real skills for the real world," has been announced by Premier Mike Harcourt.

The premier said the government's plan, called Skills Now, will invest $200 million over the next two years in creating or expanding more than 30 practical, innovative skills training and support programs.

"Our goal," he said, "is to ensure British Columbians have the skills needed for the new jobs in B.C.'s changing economy. With new industries and technologies emerging in B.C., our job is to make sure skills training keeps pace. Skills Now is a plan that will give access to the skills people need for our new and expanding job markets."

Harcourt said that the new plan will link high schools to the workplace and increase access to college and university, "so more young men and women keep ahead in our changing world. It will provide workers with the new skills they need for new jobs. And it will build on the strengths and abilities of the unemployed to help get them back into the workforce."

Skills Now is the result of a partnership between government, business, labor, educators and communities, he added.

For high school students, Skills Now will include work experience and apprenticeship preparation, graduation credits for skills learned outside the classroom, expanded stay-in-school programs, mandatory career planning and modernized vocational and technical training.

As a result of the program, there will be 8,100 new student spaces — three times the current number — in colleges and universities. It will provide degree-granting status to six colleges and institutions and create at least six new advanced technology programs in growing fields such as film animation and environmental management.

Workers will be retrained closer to home in 10 community skills centres to be established across B.C. and linked by computers and telecommunications, to provide training to 10,000 people, create 300 apprenticeships in new and growing job fields, and develop 70 small businesses in sectoral training and partnerships.

Forum brings businessmen together

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's Israel's turn.

This was the prevailing theme at the economic forum entitled Israel: Opportunities for Canadian Business held recently at the Inn on the Park in Toronto.

Premier Bob Rae called it "establishing economic alliances."

Giora Meyuhaus, Israel's economic minister for North America, told the gathering that "the glue for peace is the economic development of the region."

Benjamin Noy, trade commissioner of the Israel Economic Mission, said that the joint economic agreement between Israel and Ontario would "act as a catalyst."

At the reception that attracted 450 CEOs, presidents, investors, and entrepreneurs, many commented that political stablilty will be accompanied by increased foreign investment in the Middle East.

According to Meyuhaus, this forecast is correct. The peace process will accelerate the economic development of the region, he said.

He also noted that beside the "outstanding incentive packages Israel offers investors" which includes, for example, a 10-year tax holiday, the country offers investors other advantages.

Meyuhaus pointed to the free trade pacts Israel has with the United States and the European Economic Community (EEC) that will allow Canadian investors access to many markets.

Other factors to consider include the high percentage of qualified, creative workers; and the government's commitment to the privatization and foreign currency process.

These factors, combined with a signed trade pact between Ontario and Israel, will give an edge to those Canadian business leaders who are looking to invest in Israel.

"It is nuts to ask Canadians to compete in the Israeli market when they have a free trade agreement with the United States," Rae said, adding that its not possible to get Canadian goods at par.

"Any reluctance in respect to free trade is in the federal government. My argument is that we cannot talk of expanding on a major basis unless an agreement is in place."

Rae said past problems have blinded some to the potential of, not just the Israeli market, but looking to the long term, the economy of the Middle East.

He stressed that the peace agreement will mean access to broader markets. Ultimately, it will present opportunities for Canadian companies and Israeli firms.

Larry Keith, senior vice-president of Newbridge Networks Inc., spoke from a manufacturer's perspective on Israel.

Founded in 1986, this telecommunications firm concentrates on public networks and distribution and direct sales to private companies. Based in Kanata, Ottawa, the firm has over $500 million in sales and is No. 1 in the worldwide market share with 28 per cent.

Newbridge began doing business with the Israeli company Tadiran in 1989 and this multidimensional relationship today amounts to $15 million in sales to Israel.

Mark Smith, CEO of Claridge Israel Inc., said that in 1989, there were several positive forces at work in Israel that created an opportunity for large scale projects.

In Claridge's assessment, they included prospects for GNP growth; the existence of young, underdeveloped companies; the trend towards peace in the short and medium term; and the absence of aggressive private capital.

As Smith said, "In 1989, no one was going to Israel."

During the 18 months that followed, Claridge invested $100 million (U.S.), examined 30 businesses and completed four deals. The result — the original capital was recouped — a profit of $450 million, and all investments are liquid.

Both Keith and Smith agreed that in the past it was risky to invest in Israel. This, they say, is not true today. Those who took a gamble and invested in Israel five years ago are now reaping the benefits.

The forum was sponsored by the Israel Economic Mission to Canada, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto/UJA, and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

Seniors' meeting targets finances

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mrs. A had little experience managing money. Her husband had always taken care of everything — from investing their savings to managing the day-to-day expenses. They had save a nest egg for what they thought would be a modest, but comfortable retirement.

Unfortunately Mr. A died shortly after he retired. Interest rates had just started to decline. Suddenly Mrs. A had to manage her own money at a time when she was getting diminshed returns on her investments.

She discovered that the income from the interest on her savings was not enough to live on. She sold the family home and moved into subsidized housing. But she is still struggling to make ends meet.

Mrs. A is not alone. Goldie Leibman, coordinator of the Association of Jewish Seniors, said the drop in interest rates has effected many seniors.

In response, the association recently organized Focus on Senior Finances- increase your income safely — a financial seminar to help seniors look at investment options. "They need help to protect and maximize what they have," Leibman said, "to live the way they planned."

The seminar, which took place at the Holy Blossom Synagogue, was sponsored by CIBC bank branches at Bathurst and Lawrence, Eglinton and Glenarden and 462 Spadina Rd. About 200 people came out to hear the three guest panellists from the CIBC.

Lee Corasaniti, a regional sales rep, explained the various investment options — from stocks, and mutual funds to bonds and cash — and the risks associated with them. The CIBC has 14 mutual funds worth a total of $3.75 billion.

There are no front or back load fees — commission charged with the purchase or redemption of these funds, but yearly management fees range from half a per cent for premium treasury bill funds to 2.5 per cent for international funds.

With the fluctuating interest rates people would have a better chance of taking advantage of rate increases if they staggered the maturity dates of their GICs, Corasaniti said. She also advised them to diversify their investment portfolios.

Luke O'Brien, a retirement specialist, spoke on different financial options — such as RRIFs and annuities — for conversion of RRSPs. He advised people to prolong accessing RRSPs because this money is not taxed. But they must convert the funds by the age of 71, he said.

O'Brien discussed the differences between annuities and RRIFs. The advantage to annuities is that they are simple: people receive guaranteed incomes after passing their money to a company, he said. He pointed out the disadvantages: there are penalties if the funds are liquidated, the annuities are not indexed to inflation and some are only life plans. In the event of death there is a loss to the estate with a life plan, he said.

O'Brien advised against locking into a long term fixed annuity today because the interest rates are low.

He said RRIFs are more flexible: money can be withdrawn at any time without penalty, there are more investment options and inflation protection and any left over can be passed on to the estate.

Don Fraser, a CIBC trust business development manager, talked about wills and estate planning. The goal of estate planning for seniors, is to minimize taxes when assets are distributed, he said. "Money spent on creating a good will saves money."

The executor of a will interprets it, deals with financial and tax issues and distributes the estate, Fraser said. He recommended that executors be financially responsible and act for all beneficiaries.

He does not advise executors to be beneficiaries. As well, financial compensation to an executor is taxable, but money left to a beneficiary is not taxed.

Fraser explained that trusts can be set up to hold property and money that can be passed on from one generation to the next, or a peson can create a trust, live off the interest and will it to a beneficiary.

Leibman said she was pleased with the large turnout and the positive response of the people who attended the seminar. Many people told her the information was very informative, she said.

Joe Carter, (not the baseball player) commenting on the seminar, said he and his wife were not aware of the disadvantages of annuities. "It [the seminar] opened our eyes to a lot of things."

Ralph Kochberg, another person who attended, said the panellists gave too much information, but he found the advice on wills very helpful. He intends to follow up on Fraser's recommendation of appointing a contingent executor in case the executor of his will can't perform the duties.

Martin Lewis, a volunteer at the seminar, said he's lucky because he gets a lot of advice from his son. "But the widows are under distress. If they can find a way to maximize their earnings it would be wonderful."

TORONTO — With people living longer, money saved for retirement may run out before they die, according to Darryl Ura, a financial planner with the Financial Concept Group.

Inflation, he said, is still one of the factors that could contribute to a shortfall during retirement years in spite of the record low inflation rates of the past few years.

Ura stressed that the official inflation index, based on government and private sector inflation, is misleading. In 1992 and 1993 government inflation, which goes up when taxes increase, was 10 per cent, but the inflation for the two sectors combined worked out to 2 per cent, the official rate.

While $10,000 invested in GICs five years ago at 5 per cent interest is worth about $13,000 today, at best the investor has kept up with inflation. "[But] over the long run you're going to fall back," Ura noted.

A financial planner, he said, can make changes to a portfolio that ensure yearly income from investments will continue throughout retirement.

Ura finds some people over 50 are overwhelmed by the many investment options currently available and continue to invest in gauranteed investment certificates, when they could get a higher rate of interest from a government bond. Both GICs and government bonds are guaranteed by the government, he pointed out.

On their own, investors sometimes fail to achieve the maximum possible return on their investments, or on the other hand, take excessive risks.

Financial planners outline investment options, make recommendations and implement the plan. They look for the best interest rates, said Ura, adding that interest rates vary depending on the risk the client is comfortable with. Planners monitor portfolios and make periodic recommendations for adjustments or improvements.

Financial planners focus on long-term rather than short-term financial goals, which involves educating their clients about investments.

Clients have to understand that equities — real estate or stocks — go up and down in value, Ura emphasized. In the long run, however, equities always outperform debt instruments like bonds.

Investment strategy is developed according to a client's needs, whether it is retirement, estate or tax planning. There are no carved-in-stone investment strategies for a particular age group, such as people in their 20s, those 30 to 50, or those over 50, as other factors like income level come into play. Each client is different, said Ura.

He called diversity the key to investing as it reduces overall risk while still allowing maximum returns. He recommends a combination of mutual funds, Canadian and foreign equities, and RRSPs for any portfolio. People over 50, he said, generally own fewer equities and more income producing investments like government bonds.

Ura advises people to look for an independent financial planner without any ties to a particular product or industry. A salesperson or banker sells only the institution's often limited range of products. An independent financial planner offers the consumer a choice of hundreds of different financial products.

Ura, who has a background in real estate investment, has been with the Financial Concept Group since 1992. The company has more than a hundred financial planners in 25 offices in Ontario and the Northwest Territories and is one of the largest independent investment dealers in Canada.

When Ura is not at work, he volunteers for the Baycrest Hospital and Israeli Bonds. The bonds, Ura noted, are now RRSP eligible.

Ottawa prepares to get tough on hate crimes

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Judges might be handing out harsher sentences for hate crimes after changes to the Criminal Code proposed by Minister of Justice Allan Rock.

Rock, speaking in Ottawa at a human rights and justice conference organized by Canadian Jewish Congress, said hate should be recognized as an influence in any offence, from vandalism to violence, and be reflected in sentencing.

"What I'm proposing," he told reporters after his address at the conference, "is the possibility of amending the Criminal Code [so that in sentencing] the court must take into account, as an aggravating factor, the fact that someone was motivated in committing the crime by hate."

He said the tougher sentences would apply to crimes against anyone targeted because of bias, including homosexuals, religious and racial groups.

He expects to propose the amendment in the House of Commons by mid-June.

Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, welcomed the proposed amendment to the Criminal Code, saying it would bolster Canada's hate laws.

"It would increase the sentencing and it might act as a deterrent [to hate crimes], we don't know, but it will send out a very strong message."

David Matas, honorary senior council for B'nai Brith Canada, says he was disappointed with Rock's proposal because it deals with hate crimes after the damage has been done.

"[The proposed amendments] deal with the problem much too late ... It's much better to deal with the hate itself."

For instance, he says, Holocaust denial should become a criminal offence. And hate-mongers should not be able to use the "defence of truth", which allows them to try and prove in court for instance, that the Holocaust never happened or that some races are inferior.

Allan Rock

But Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, says Canada has effective hate laws. Changing them would probably make them unconstitutional and leave the country without any hate legislation at all.

"You change one comma of that law, you remove one word from that law, and that law can once again go before the Supreme Court of Canada," he said. "If the law goes before the Supreme Court, we may throw out the baby with the bath water."

Farber applauded Rock's proposal. He said victims of hate crimes will feel there is justice in longer sentences for crimes motivated by hate.

"I think it's a strong message to hate-mongers out there that this government is taking hate crimes seriously," Farber said.

TORONTO — Worried by the implications of recent statements by PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, the Canadian government on May 20 asked a senior official at the Canadian embassy in Tunis to press for clarification from the PLO, which is headquartered in Tunis.

The Canadian government move was officially described as a "demarche," a diplomatic initiative, to present the government's concerns that Arafat's recent statements impair the Declaration of Principles and the peace process, said Stuart Hughes, of the Department of Foreign Affairs.

On May 10 Arafat called in a speech in a Johannesburg mosque for a jihad (holy war) for Jerusalem and alluded to an account in the Koran of the Prophet Mohammed's abrogation of a treaty.

The PLO officials told the Canadian embassy official that Arafat's remarks in the mosque were in a religious connotation and meant a peaceful struggle.

"We have to take them at their word on this," said Hughes. "We're interested in keeping the peace process going."

On the reference to abrogation of a treaty, Hughes said the PLO explanation was that it was an arrangement between the founder of Islam and some ruling families which the families subsequently broke. Therefore, it was not a case of walking away from the agreement.

There is a growing sense of discomfort within the Canadian Jewish community and in Israel over Arafat's statements, Donald Carr, vice-chairman, Canada-Israel Committee, told a meeting at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto May 26.

Growing uncertainty about the PLO's ability to carry out the Declaration of Principles is one of the reasons only a "scant portion" of the $2.4 billion pledged by 43 countries or non-governmental agencies to aid the PLO has been paid, said David Goldberg, research director, Foundation for Middle East Studies.

The recent statements by Arafat have "exacerbated" the situation, Goldberg said. "Many are worried that the PLO has no infrastructure in place and that Arafat is slow in appointing professional people such as economists to supervise the funds. No one wants to send money if they are not sure where it's going. There are big bucks involved."

On this point, the CIC has expressed concern to the Canadian government about the $55 million promised by Canada for Palestinian infrastructure.

The CIC has proposed several options, including the withholding of Canadian funds, until the PLO demonstrates a consistent commitment to agreements already in place, active involvement in eliminating terrorist and violent incidents in Gaza (which have escalated considerably since the IDF withdrawal last week) and a clear demonstration that the PLO enjoys the support of the indigenous Palestinian population.

Joint fund launched for high-tech ventures

TORONTO — It was three years in the making, but Canada and Israel last week unveiled a $6-million research fund for high technology joint ventures.

The Canada Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), a non-profit organization, is funded by Industry Canada and the Israeli Ministry of Industry. Each government has pledged $1 million in R&D funding for each of the next three years.

"The amount of money is very modest, but the foundation represents a breakthrough," said Benjamin Noy, the Toronto-based Israeli government trade commissioner who helped broker the deal.

The arrangement is a first-ever for Canada. Israel has similar agreements with the United States, Holland, Germany and France.

Dr. Henri Rothschild

Dr. Henri Rothschild, currently chief scientist for Industry Canada, will head the foundation.

New beth din prepares to sit in Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Jewish community of Toronto will take another major step on June 9, Rosh Chodesh Tammuz, with the first session of a beth din kavuah, a permanently sitting rabbinic court, under the auspices of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Vaad, announced that the new beth din will sit on Thursdays, from noon until 1 p.m., at Clanton Park Synagogue, 11 Lowesmoor Ave., in North York. It will be staffed by a rotating roster of Vaad members.

"The Vaad felt that it is necessary that there be a permanent beth din, sitting regularly at a specific time and location, so that people can bring issues and problems they feel might need a rabbinic, Torah solution," Rabbi Stern explained.

Such matters might include adoption, conversions, business disputes, or any other problem that the community might feel needs rabbinic input.

The beth din kavuah will not be only for the Orthodox community, Rabbi Stern said, but will be available to serve the needs of the entire Jewish community.

He stressed that matters will not be resolved at the beth din kavuah; rather, it will act principally as a consulting body, to explain procedures and to determine whether — and what — further action need be taken on any particular issue.

The fact that the Vaad has organized this new structure from which the community can seek advice and consultation, Rabbi Stern said, is 'a further indication of how much progress the Jewish community has made."

Sexual assault myths debunked by panel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sexual assault has nothing to do with passion or sickness and everything to do with asserting power and control, a forum sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) was told last week.

Men who sexually assault — and 99 per cent of these crimes are committed by men — don't do it because they are starved for sex or are mentally ill, but because they need to assert power over women they view as vulnerable, the sparse evening audience heard.

Sexual assault is defined as any unwanted act of a sexual nature and is shrouded in many myths, JF&CS therapist Gail Solish said.

For one, the problem exists in the Jewish community, despite efforts to downplay or deny it. It cuts across all religious boundaries and the shame victims associate with it may be one reason why it's under-reported, Solish explained.

Among the many myths surrounding sexual assault are:

- It's not a common problem. In fact, surveys show that half of all Canadian women have experienced at least one incident of sexual and physical abuse, with 60 per cent of those reporting more than one incident. And one in seven men report having been sexually assaulted.
- Women "ask for it" by the way they dress or act. Women, Solish countered, cannot be blamed for being assaulted, no matter how they dress or act. And men don't assault because they are sexually aroused; they do it for power.
- Sexual assault is committed by strangers. Of women who are assaulted, 69 per cent know their attackers, whether friends, relatives, dates, neighbors or work associates.
- Women cannot be assaulted by their husbands. Sexual assault within relationship has been a crime since 1983, and 38 per cent of victims were assaulted by husbands, boyfriends or common-law partners.
- It's only sexual assault if physical violence or a weapon is used. In fact, Solish said, the Criminal Code's definition of the act ranges from unwanted sexual touching to sexual violence resulting in wounding, maiming and even death.

An unfortunate statistic, Solish noted, is that only six per cent of sexual assaults are reported to police, making it among the most under-reported crimes.

Women, she said, don't report the crime mainly out of fear and shame and the belief that police are powerless to stop it.

Another alarming number comes from a recent survey showing 60 per cent of college-age students saying they would commit sexual assault if assured they would get away with it.

Laura Silver, a Crown attorney specializing in sexual abuse cases, took the audience through the complex legal maze that exists for both victims and perpetrators.

It's up to police to lay charges, based on a complainant's credibility, Silver said.

Generally, if the complaint is of a severe nature, the accused will be detained, she added.

And the victim's identity is usually protected because courts tend to grant such bans, Silver said.

Metro Police Staff Sgt. Diane MacInnes said sexual assault "has nothing to do with passion or hormones. It all centres on vulnerability."

Often, MacInnes said, a woman's body language or overall demeanor can signal vulnerability to an attacker.

She advised women to adopt more "masculine," business-like conduct.

JF&CS is scheduled to begin regular sessions for sexual assault victims this month if there's sufficient interest. Call (416) 638-7800 for details.

Abusive relationships found throughout community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Violence against women in the Jewish community not only exists, it is in proportion to the size of the community, members of a recent panel agreed.

The panel, sponsored by the Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood, included Mary Lou Fassel, director of legal services, Barbara Schlifer Commemorative Clinic; Lilith, writer and activist; Paula Klein, social worker and board member, Criminal Injuries Compensation Board; Ronnie Jaeger, social worker, Jewish Family & Child Service. Moderator was Lynn Cohen, counsellor/advocate, Barbara Schlifer Commemorative Clinic.

Jaeger said that it is difficult to get statistics on violence in the Jewish community because not all women come forward. "We can only count those that have come to JF&CS but 20 per cent of the cases we do see involve violence against women."

She said that from data the agency has gathered in the past two years, it has determined that: Jewish women tend to stay in abusive relationships longer than women in the general community; Jewish immigrant women are more reluctant to seek help than their Canadian counterparts; Jewish women and their spouses generally have the same level of education; and members of all professions have been abused.

"A fact we found interesting," she said, "is that a much smaller percentage of abusive men come from abusive homes than in the general community. Coupled with that, there is less alcohol, drug and criminal involvement. . .

"What is less proven, but many women claim to be true, is that abusive Jewish men are more careful not to leave visible marks. One woman said that after her husband gave her a black eye, he took the children to and from school so she would not be seen and everyone at school told her what a good husband she had."

Klein said that too many people in the Jewish community deny that domestic violence exists. "Shalom bayit assumes that the family is a safe place. If we are not safe in our family, then we have no safety, so we deny abuse exists. Within our community we have batterers, rapists, child abusers and those who abuse elderly parents. If we impose silence and denial then we are perpetuating shame."

She said that for Jews to acknowledge that they are no different than the general society is seen as a betrayal of all Jews. "We have designed a self-perception that does not perpetuate reality. If we cannot talk about all our problems then we are in danger."

Jaeger said that women in the Orthodox community are speaking out more about abuse and that rabbis have been responsive to JF&CS, but they "tend to see it as which side is right. There is a judgment connected, often at the expense of the women or the workers' safety. Some rabbis have also been intimidated by wealthy donors."

Lilith said that large donations to a religious institution should not disclaim investigation into alleged domestic violence.

Jaeger admitted that JF&CS is failing women because there is a much greater need for service than there are resources. "The community has to know that we are facing a crisis in terms of service but when someone comes to us about violence we do make an immediate assessment for safety. If required, we have a kosher shelter or we can refer them to another shelter and we also have groups for battered women and incest survivors. Shame

Quebec harbored French collaborators, researchers find

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Spokesmen for local Jewish groups weighed their words carefully in assessing the impact of recent revelations that Jacques Duge and other French collaborators came to Quebec after World War II with the help of some of the province's most prominent nationalist figures.

In the May 20 issue of the French-language daily Le Devoir, researchers Jean-Francois Nadeau and Gonzalo Arriaga, both graduate students at Montreal universities, meticulously reviewed the personal papers and detailed the efforts of the late Quebec historian Robert Rumilly in building a network of right-wing lobbyists.

The object of the lobby efforts was to bring Duge, Klaus Barbie's right-hand man, and other French collaborators and Nazis, whom they thought of as "French political refugees," to the province after the war.

Besides Duge, known also as "Count Jacques de Bernonville," the list of Vichy regime collaborators or war criminals who came to Quebec from 1946 on included Count Viktor Kayserling, a German SS officer who ended up working for the British United Press in Montreal before eventually fleeing to Haiti; and Dr. Georges-Benoit Montel, a Nazi collaborator from Lyon, where Barbie, known as the "Butcher of Lyon," served as Gestapo chief.

The list of "refugees" also included, among others, Dr. Michel-Lucien Seigneur, a veteran of the French SS; and Julien Labedan, leader of the Vichy militia.

In 1947, while he was in Quebec, Duge was sentenced in absentia to death by a French court. But in 1951, as Canada was preparing to deport him back to France despite the efforts of Rumilly's lobby network, he fled to Brazil to avoid French extradition. He was found murdered there in 1972.

Locally, the names of prominent French-Canadians who supported the "refugees" coming to Quebec read like a virtual who's who of nationalist figures of the era.

Jewish groups react cautiously

According to the Rumilly papers, the researchers found, they included Catholic church leaders; Montreal Mayor Camilien Houde; Rene Chaloult, who designed the Quebec flag; and right-wing historian Father Lionel Groulx, who of late has become somewhat more notoriously known for his anti-Semitism.

The researchers also mentioned some Quebec personalities of today whose names appeared 40 years ago on petitions supporting the so-called French "refugees."

Among them were Andre Payette, a well-known Quebec journalist; Parti-Quebcois MNA Denis Lazure; Jean-Marc Leger, director of the Fondation Lionel Groulx; and Dr. Camille Laurin, best known as the author of Quebec's language law, Bill 101, who is running in the coming provincial election.

It is this aspect of the story which prompted Jewish groups to react cautiously.

Max Bernard, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region's (CJC-Q) community relations committee, strongly deplored the fact that such activities took place 45 years ago.

But as pointed out by historians like Esther Delisle, the help the collaborators received was not out of keeping with the widespread influence fascist ideology, anti-Semitism, and Catholic reactionary forces continued to wield over the intellectual sensibility of the province, even after the Holocaust, he said.

Petition asked for leniency

What appeared much less certain, Bernard stressed, is whether individuals like Laurin or Lazure even knew who Duge really was when, as idealistic university students at the Universite de Montreal (U of M), their names were attached to a telegram beseeching Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent to help the "count of Bernonville" stay in Canada.

When asked about this in the Le Devoir article, Lazure, who during this period served as president of the U of M's student body, only vaguely recalled the count's name, "nothing more."

Laurin's type-written name also appeared among 142 others on the 1950 petition.

But he, as well, only "vaguely" remembered the name. He told Le Devoir he had no recollection of the petition or of trying to help Duge remain in Canada.

Payette, for his part, remembers meeting Rumilly on one occasion and being taken in by his argument that the count was a "great man" being victimized by Ottawa because he was French.

But when Payette found out who "the count" really was, he said, he took a position against Rumilly.

Leger, who once was an editorial writer for Le Devoir, said it was not until the 1950s that he learned the "count" was actually Duge.

It is for this reason, Bernard said, that CJC was being "very cautious" about turning the latest revelations into a "political" issue, particularly when there is "no evidence" that people like Laurin or Lazure were involved.

For Stephen Scheinberg, national chair for B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, it is also entirely plausible that people like Laurin and Lazure signed petitions because they naively thought they were helping a "poor Frenchman," not a notorious Nazi.

"You can't translate a signature asking for leniency as commitment to fascism," he said. "I would be careful with that."

By the same token, the latest revelations disturb Scheinberg.

"One would have hoped," he said, "that Quebecers who were followers of Groulx [during the 1930s] would have been shocked to their senses by the events of World War II.

"But evidently it did not change them at all.

"They were still more concerned with protecting 'good Catholics' and 'good conservatives'."

Ida Nudel charms Toronto audience

Former Soviet prisoner

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a while, it looked like a scene from the late 1970s or early '80s: prominent Soviet Jewry activists, clergy and politicians packed into a room, perusing printed handouts, waiting for a speaker.

Only this time, the speaker was Ida Nudel, who immigrated to Israel nearly seven years ago after having suffered as the old Soviet Union's only female Prisoner of Conscience.

And many of those present at last week's private reception here for Nudel were teary-eyed, for they were finally seeing the woman for whom they had fought and lobbied so hard.

Nudel, a diminutive 63-year-old who radiates energy, returned the sentiment. "You cannot know what it means," she said in a confident English, "that someone is looking at you, keeping you alive. If you had not taken a stand, many of us would not have survived. Every one of you saved lives."

On hand to toast Nudel on her first visit to Toronto were past recipients of the Ida Nudel Humanitarian Award: activists June Callwood and Sister Mary Jo Leddy, and former federal cabinet minister Barbara McDougall. Nudel presented each in turn with a copy of her autobiography, A Hand in the Darkness.

Also attending was a veritable who's who of one-time front-line fighters for Soviet Jews: Marsha Slavens, Jeanette Goldman, Joyce Eklove and the last national chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's (CJC) Soviet Jewry committee, Wendy Eisen.

They joined CJC national president Irving Abella and such community figures as Rabbi Gunther Plaut, Kurt Rothschild, Judge Rosalie Abella, Arlene Perly Rae, David Rotenberg, Ontario MPP Don Cousens and Rev. John Erb in welcoming Nudel.

"Tonight we celebrate your speech and words," said Sister Leddy, and, paraphrasing Russian poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko, said Nudel's tears during her hellish years fell on the cheeks of her far-off supporters "as if snowflakes."

An economist by training, Nudel first applied to leave the U.S.S.R. for Israel in 1971. She was refused on grounds of "state interests."

She then began a lobbying campaign on behalf of other Refuseniks, earning her the moniker "Angel of Mercy." Her sole relative, her sister Elana Fridman, was granted permission to leave for Israel in 1972.

In 1978, Nudel hung a banner from her Moscow apartment reading, "KGB, Give Me My Visa!" She was placed under house arrest and later charged with "malicious hooliganism."

Later that year, she was sentenced to four years in Siberia, where she was the sole woman in a prison for hardened criminals.

Nudel faced ill health and constant danger, and slept with a knife under her pillow.

Following the prison term, Nudel lived in internal exile in Bendery, now in Moldova.

Canada's involvement in her plight goes back to 1979, when then external affairs minister Flora MacDonald made several representations on Nudel's behalf.

During a visit to Ottawa in late 1985 by then Soviet foreign minister Eduard Shevardnadze, both Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and External Affairs Minister Joe Clark reportedly raised Nudel's case.

Nudel was released in late 1987 and came to Israel aboard U.S. industrialist Armand Hammer's private Boeing 727 to a tumultuous welcome, finally joining the sister she had not seen in 16 years.

U.S. actress Jane Fonda was among Nudel's staunchest supporters.

It was activists such as those in Toronto who brought about her release, Nudel said.

"Your activity made the KGB feel responsible. Often, it was very difficult to go on, but almost all of us who came out of prison [are] healthy and sane. Many others are dead or crippled," she said.

"We won," she added, "because we are determined."

Nudel made a pitch for Hallel, a non-profit organization in Israel that provides newcomers with integration services.

Community mobilizes over continuity issue

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We are losing our people to assimilation, indifference and desertion of our religion and culture. . . We are in jeopardy of losing our Jewish identity."

Those troubling words are part of a message from Stanley Plotnick, chair of the national commission on Jewish identity and continuity of the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada (CJF).

His words were included in the commission's first newsletter and formed the basis of a meeting last weekend of community activists and religious leaders attempting to tackle the thorny problem of continuity.

Twenty-five people gathered at a Toronto airport hotel in a brainstorming session to exchange information and ideas about community reaction to continuity.

They discussed youth retention programs, leadership development initiatives, how to attract unaffiliated Jews and how to increase cooperation between religious and secular leaders.

The participants included representatives of federation continuity committees in Calgary, Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, students, and four rabbis representing Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations.

Invitations were issued to the unfederated communities in Saskatchewan and the Maritimes as well as to smaller communities in Ontario.

The goal of the meeting was to kick-start various communities across Canada into taking action against the worrying trend of assimilation and intermarriage, said Sheldon Maerov, executive-director of CJF Canada.

CJF will bring together local community groups for discussion and help distribute information, Maerov said.

"We're focusing from the bottom up, from the community up, to help communities develop strategies, to see what works and what information is needed," he said.

Maerov and Plotnick cite several disturbing statistics, based on data from the 1991 Canadian Census, that prompted creation of the continuity committees.

In Canada, approximately 50,000 people identify themselves as Jews by ethnicity alone and not by religion. The intermarriage rate among Jews nationwide is 16.2 per cent, with the rate reaching 35.4 per cent in Vancouver and 22.8 per cent in Ottawa.

"We know that if we continue to do what we're doing, we'll lose the basis of those who identify as Jews," Maerov said.

Penni Kolb, a spokesman for ProMontreal, a youth retention initiative of Montreal's Federation CJA, said the two-year-old program has achieved good results on a number of fronts. It has compiled a list of 1,500 young people who have had help finding jobs; it has a 3,000-name list of young people who participate in social and cultural events; and publishes a glossy magazine, In Montreal, that many young Montrealers read.

Rabbi Jeffrey Gale of Temple Shalom in Winnipeg told the meeting that "the underlying concern is a spiritual malaise."

He said synagogues must serve as a modern "counter-culture" to the prevailing ethos in society which trumpets "the values of the marketplace."

Synagogues must also reach out to Jews who don't fit the "Ozzie and Harriet [family] model." Single mothers, interfaith couples and families with dual breadwinners must also be the subject of synagogue outreach, he said.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue in Montreal called for a cooperative atmosphere between synagogues and federations and a recognition of the importance that houses of worship play in Jewish life.

He also called on federation lay leaders to increase their participation in religious life and serve as role models to the rest of the community.

Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto, opened the meeting with a d'var Torah.

Jerome Shore, proprietor of the Coaching Clinic, served as facilitator in a brainstorming session.

Golan residents seek funds to help publicize their cause

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israelis opposed to the policy of exchanging the Golan Heights for a peace treaty with Syria are asking Canadian Jews for financial support to help publicize their campaign against the proposed move.

Giving up the Heights would endanger the fundamental security of the State of Israel, contend Chaim Saperia and Yoash Tsiddon-Chatto.

"We are here to try to convey the message of the vital existential importance of the Golan Heights to Israel's defence," said Tsiddon-Chatto, a colonel in the air force reserve. "Settling the Golan was like taking an oath that this is where we will stay. It's become part of the body of Israel."

Saperia, a spokesman for the three-year-old Golan Settlement Committee, said the organization was "founded for the purpose of the struggle against any movement of Israel from the Golan Heights. Not even one centimetre."

The movement includes "all sides of the Israeli political spectrum," from left to right, as well as both observant and secular Jews. It also represents the majority of the Golan's 13,000 Jews, he said.

A resident of Alonei Habashan, the easternmost of the Golan's 32 settlements, Saperia said he, his wife and daughter joined the community six years ago, moving from Jerusalem. He joined a group of fellow students from the Hapoel Hamizrachi movement that settled in Alonei Habashan after then defence minister Ariel Sharon "tried to convince us to establish the yishuv (settlement) at the place of Syrian penetration" during the Yom Kippur War of 1973.

Tsiddon-Chatto, a member of the Knesset for the right-wing Tsomet Party from 1988-92, resides in the Tel Aviv area but believes the future of the Golan Heights affects all Israelis. The Golan Heights provides Israel with an important strategic card to play against Syria, he said. Israel's presence deters Syrian agression and it gives Israel "control of the plain up to Damascus." If Israel were to give up the Heights in exchange for a treaty with Syrian dictator Hafez al-Assad, it will lead to war, he contended.

From 1949-67 when Syria controlled the heights, Syria violated more than 400 ceasefires, he said. But after a 1977 ceasefire agreement, "not one shot" has been fired on the Heights.

Why change that situation, give up the key high ground and take a chance that Assad or a subsequent leader will change their mind and open hostilities with Israel? he asked.

Both Assad and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat still maintain the goal of eradicating Israel, he added.

Turning his attention to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Tsiddon-Chatto said the prime minister has reversed his own pre-election assurances given the Golan settlers that Israel would not withdraw from the Heights.

Rabin has been outmaneuvered by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin and the left wing of the Labor Party, he suggested.

"My feeling is that this government is in a flat spin," the former Spitfire and Skyhawk pilot said. "They are themselves at a loss to stop this fall into the abyss."

Saperia said that with talk of relinquishing the Heights, the mood among the area's 13,000 settlers has sunk to one of depression. "It's hard to find anyone smiling today," he said. The future of the communities is all anyone talks about.

A minority have stated they will leave their homes if they are offered suitable compensation, he added.

Saperia and Tsiddon-Chatto were guests in Canada of the Canadian Friends of Ramat Hagolan (CFRH), an ad hoc collection of people that also includes some supporters of Yesha, the settlers movement in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. They addressed two small gatherings in Toronto and the national convention of B'nai Brith Canada, held in Niagara-on-the-Lake.

Henry Zieleniec, a spokesman for CFRH, said the organization has almost 500 supporters in Toronto, to whom it turns for help in financing settlers' efforts to publicize their concerns abroad and in Israel. He said CFRH hopes to establish similar groups in Montreal and in other Canadian centres.

Non-Jewish immigration sparks controversy in Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Twenty-nine per cent of all immigrants to Israel this past year were not Jewish, the Interior Ministry revealed last week.

The figure surfaced in a meeting of the Knesset's Immigration and Absorption Committee, and prompted calls from the fervently Orthodox to repeal the Law of Return, which grants immigration and citizenship rights to Jews and their families.

But Yair Tsaban, minister of immigrant absorption from the liberal Meretz party, defended the status quo, saying the non-Jewish immigrants were generally spouses of Jews, and their immigration was a move against assimilation and loss.

The Law of Return is seen as symbolizing the Jewish character of the State of Israel.

It has also served as a lightning rod for the Orthodox parties in their effort to implement their vision of a Jewish state. For years, there were efforts to amend the law's definition of who is a Jew, to exclude non-Orthodox conversions.

Now, with the continuing mass immigration from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, attention has been focused on the clauses permitting anyone who is the grandchild of a Jew to be recognized as a Jew for the purposes of immigration and citizenship and extending those privileges to non-Jewish spouses.

In one case, a member of the Falash Mora group — Ethiopians whose ancestors converted from Judaism to Christianity — recently converted to Judaism and then immigrated with dozens of his family.

For Rabbi Avraham Ravitz of the Orthodox Degel HaTorah party, the figures point to a need to repeal or radically reformulate the Law of Return.

"It is clearly being used to help those it was not intended for," said Rabbi Ravitz, "thousands, hundreds of thousands of non-Jews. They are exploiting us, and this is the only country the Jews have."

He pointed to what he termed "wholesale fraud" by immigrants passing themselves off as Jewish.

In his opinion, the number of non-Jewish immigrants is far higher than 29 per cent.

Rabbi Ravitz said these immigrants do not yearn to be in Israel but are intent on leaving their own country, and Israel is virtually the only country open to them.

Some, he said, are downright anti-Semitic. Others — not just individuals but entire communities — continue to observe Christian festivals, he charged.

But Tsaban has countered that Rabbi Ravitz was again attempting to insert into the Law of Return the concept of "conversion according to Halachah" in the section that seeks to define Jews who were not born of Jewish mothers.

By letting the Jewish spouse or partner immigrate with the entire family, said Tsaban, the Law of Return enables them all to become part of the Jewish state.

"But above all," said Tsaban, "we have to remember the immense contribution to the life of our country that immigration makes. And we can't treat this immigration differently from the way we treated others."

In all, he said, more than 600,000 people have immigrated to Israel in the past four years.

Bible Lands Museum celebrates

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The spirit of ancient Rome could be felt in Jerusalem last month, as images of the catacombs of Rome went on display, and toga-clad models showed off Roman-inspired couture.

These were just a few of the events organized by Jerusalem's Bible Lands Museum to mark its second anniversary.

The museum — the only one in the world devoted to the peoples and lands described in the Bible — was founded in 1991 by Dr. Elie and Batya Borowski. The former Torontonians, who now live in Jerusalem, donated their extensive personal collection of antiquities to establish the museum. It includes artifacts from a dozen civilizations spanning over 6,000 years.

The museum kicked off its second anniversary celebrations with the opening of a new photo documentary exhibition, Vaults of Memory: Jewish and Christian Imagery in the Catacombs of Rome.

The exhibition — on loan from the International Catacomb Society of Boston, Mass. — provides glimpses of the Jewish, Christian and pagan cemeteries found in the labyrinth of burial tunnels encircling Rome. It illustrates how Judaism, early Christianity and paganism existed side-by-side, often influencing each other and using similar motifs and images.

In a lighter vein, the spirit of Rome inspired a unique fashion show at the museum: a display of designer togas created and modelled by local high school students from the Goldstein Youth Village.

The show was the culmination of a year-long project, in which the fashion design students received gift memberships, enabling them to visit the museum regularly to study its collections.

To create their Roman fashions, the students drew on the ancient motifs displayed at the museum, as well as using modern techniques of textile design, including computer generated graphics.

The fashion show was one of the highlights of a gala anniversary dinner in honor of two of the museum's dedicated supporters: Lily and Nathan Silver, also former Torontonians now living in Jerusalem.

The Silvers' role in supporting the museum was praised by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, one of several distinguished guests at the dinner, which was chaired by Member of Knesset Eliahu Ben Elissar, and attended by Canadian Ambassador to Israel Norman Spector, member of Knesset Benny Begin, State Comptroller Miriam Ben Porat, acting director of the museum Batya Borowski, and many museum supporters.

Toronto Reunion: Bible Lands Museum director Batya Borowski (left), formerly of Toronto, and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert (second from right) joined Lily and Nathan Silver, also former Torontonians, for a recent bash marking the museum's second anniversary. The event also paid tribute to the Silvers for their patronage of the museum. [Israel Photo]

The Silvers, who immigrated to Israel from Toronto in 1973, have contributed to many projects throughout Jerusalem.

Their support for the museum permitted the establishment of a unique program that uses the most modern communications techniques to shed light on some of the most ancient ones. Called the multimedia seal program, it enables visitors to explore the museum's impressive collection of ancient seals through an interactive computer program. Seals were used by people of the Near East as amulets and official stamps.

The computer program — designed by Icons Ltd., a Jerusalem software company — allows the visitor to select any seal, view it close up on the computer screen, print or roll out its motif, and explore its cultural, historical, religious, geographical and biblical significance.

The project, initiated several months ago, is the first stage of a planned network of multimedia stations to be installed throughout the museum.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

TROJMAN

Nina Coleman, of Scarborough, has been wondering for half a century about the origin of her mother's maiden name which was Trojman or Tordjman. It appears the name got a little mangled which makes it tougher to track down.

It may come from Trojanow in Poland or Trojany, a shtetl northeast of Warsaw.

If her forebears came from Ukraine, the name may have come from the townlet Troyanow.

Pollard, Zeitz tie the knot

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a bittersweet mazel tov.

And it's no usual wedding announcement, although it sounds ordinary enough.

"Jonathan and I wish to announce our marriage," Elaine Zeitz of Toronto coolly informed The CJN last week, referring to her recent nuptials to convicted spy for Israel, Jonathan Pollard.

Zeitz, Pollard's fiancee for at least the last three years and his most ardent advocate, married the world's most famous Jewish prisoner in a private ceremony behind bars, at the Federal Correctional Institute in Butner, N.C., where Pollard is serving a life sentence for passing classified documents to Israel.

Because of the extraordinary security net that surrounds Pollard, there's little more his new bride can say.

She can only add that the ceremony took place during one of her recent visits to Butner. She can't divulge who performed the service or who attended.

The sole details she reveals are that the ceremony was "informal," but in accordance with Halachah, and that there were no wedding pictures taken, since Jonathan is prohibited from being photographed.

Jonathan Pollard

"You can't imagine what it was like to leave him there," Zeitz, 39, allows in a rare moment of emotion.

"I wish with all my heart I could tell you more. I wish I could detail the abuse he goes through. If people knew, there would be outrage."

Outrage was in no small supply earlier this spring, when U.S. President Bill Clinton decided against commuting Pollard's sentence to time already served, even after a personal plea from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Jewish groups demanded a review and called for Pollard's release, arguing he had already served twice as much jail time as anyone convicted of a similar offence.

According to some reports, Pollard is eligible for parole next year. But both he and Zeitz see no hope for parole at all, partly because of Clinton's decision but also because the U.S. intelligence community still seems to consider Pollard a major security threat.

"Our original intention was that it was a private matter between the two of us," Zeitz said of the marriage. "But circumstances compel us to share our secret with the world."

As Zeitz sees it, her campaign for Pollard will carry more weight now that she's his wife.

Or as Pollard himself put it to Zeitz after the couple's decision to announce their marriage: "No one can question the legitimacy of a man's wife speaking out urgently on his behalf. It's time for the world to know that you are my wife."

A former U.S. Navy civilian intelligence analyst, Pollard was arrested in 1985 after Israel's embassy in Washington would not protect him. He was later charged with one count of spying for an ally but never with treason or harming U.S. interests.

Elaine Zeitz

In return for leniency for himself and his first wife and co-accused, Anne, he agreed to forgo a public trial.

But then-U.S. secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger wrote a scathing report saying Pollard's action had resulted in irreparable harm to national security, and calling Pollard a "traitor."

At an in-camera hearing in 1987, Pollard received a life term and has since been in some of the toughest jails in the United States, mostly in solitary confinement.

Anne Pollard served nearly four years. Now divorced from Jonathan, she lives in Israel.

A year ago, Pollard was transferred to Butner, where he works 12 hours a day at a textile plant and is reported in ill health.

"He is the most monitored, most abused, most harassed prisoner in America today," contends Zeitz, who won't discuss her relationship with Pollard prior to 1990. "He is subject to rules and regulations no other prisoner faces. I know. I saw it with my own eyes. Even when I was with him, I saw how he was singled out. I saw the signs of abuse.

"For some time now, Jonathan and I have been swimming upstream, trying to do what needs to be done to secure his immediate release, and finding ourselves blocked, delayed or interfered with every step of the way" she says. "We can no longer go on this way. That's why we have decided to go public."

Foundation orchestrates Canada-Israel ventures

[Cont'd. from page 1]

"We'd like Israelis to think of Canada as more than just the northern part of North America," Rothschild told The CJN from Ottawa, where the foundation will be based.

Like BIRD, the $130-million Bi-Lateral Research and Development foundation established by Israel and the U.S., CIIRDF will fund 50 per cent of research in areas like telecommunications, microelectronics, software, biotechnology and aviation. Two per cent of sales will go towards repaying the grant if the new product is successful.

Noy said he expects the foundation will fund between five and six projects each year, with maximum funding reaching $300,000 per project. Rothschild said he sees CIIRDF funding between 30 and 50 projects, many of them $20,000 or $30,000 feasibility studies.

Both parties see the foundation as a leap forward. By orchestrating joint ventures between Canadian and Israeli companies, they say, CIIRDF reduces R&D risks and costs and allows small and mid-sized companies to put their products on the marketplace more quickly while sharing expertise.

"There is an interest here in Israeli high technology," Noy said. "Now Canadians will be able to take advantage of technologies that exist in Israel, and vice versa."

Noy wants the provincial governments to join the foundation, and said Israel is prepared to put up matching funds to that end.

According to 1993 figures, Canada and Israel conduct $309 million a year in trade. There are no figures for Canadian-Israeli joint ventures, but Noy estimated only "a handful" are in the high technology fields.

Vatican downplays document accepting guilt for Holocaust

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The Vatican is playing down reports from Jerusalem about a groundbreaking new document that reportedly will place unprecedented "co-responsibility" and "guilt" for the Holocaust on the Roman Catholic Church.

"It is a draft," Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro Valls stressed last week, referring to the document so enthusiastically received only days before. "No Church authority has approved it yet and it does not reflect an official position of the Church at this stage."

He noted, however, that the Church had "clearly expressed" its condemnation of anti-Semitism on numerous occasions, including in statements by Pope John Paul II and in the new Universal Catechism.

Italian newspapers last Thursday headlined reports of the new document, as carried by Israel Radio and heralded as "mind-boggling" and "unparalleled" by Rabbi David Rosen, director of interfaith relations and Vatican liaison for the Anti-Defamation League in Jerusalem.

The draft document surfaced in Jerusalem at a conference of the International Liaison Committee for Relations between Jews and the Vatican.

The acceptance of guilt stated in the document stunned Jewish participants at the conference and was hailed by Jewish interfaith experts in Jerusalem and the United States as a massive advance in Jewish-Christian relations.

The draft spoke of "shame and repentance" and called on God for forgiveness. It went far beyond any previous official Catholic pronouncement on Christian religious roots of anti-Semitism and the failure of the Church to speak out during the Holocaust.

It examined the anti-Semitism that spurred the expulsion from Spain in 1492 and viewed that as first link in the chain of events leading to the Holocaust.

The document acknowledged that "the Church as a whole offered no effective resistance to the Nazi persecution and extermination."

Italian newspapers called the draft a "mea culpa" — self-accusation of guilt — for the Holocaust by the Church.

But media reports in Italy described Vatican officials as "irritated" by what the newspaper La Repubblica said is "the tendency by the Israeli side to take as given — and to launch as scoops on the international scene — matters that are still under consideration."

A cautionary note about expecting too much from the final Vatican document was also sounded in Amsterdam by the secretary of the Dutch Roman Catholic Council for the Church and Israel, Marcel Poorthuis.

He said in a radio interview last week that the authors of the draft were not members of an official commission.

Poorthuis noted that many Roman Catholics would be unable to understand a confession of guilt by the Vatican, since according to Church doctrine, the Holy See is infallible.

Because a large number of Church members are not yet ready for such a declaration, he said, the Vatican will have to take account of them when it issues the final document.

Support dropping for talks with PLO

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Public support for further negotiations with the PLO has dropped sharply, a national poll revealed on Friday.

The poll, published in the mass Hebrew daily Yediot Aharonot, said 63 percent of the public is opposed to further self-rule negotiations with the PLO, and that more than a quarter of those who supported the Israel-PLO accord now oppose it.

The survey was taken last Tuesday and Wednesday, shortly after two IDF soldiers were killed in Gaza, and after PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat's controversial remarks were publicized.

In his comments, Arafat called for Muslims to wage a "jihad" (holy war) to liberate Jerusalem.

According to the poll, only 35 per cent of Israelis want to continue negotiations, while two per cent did not respond.

The survey further indicated that 27 per cent of respondents said they have shifted from support of the accord to outright opposition, while another 13 per cent said their support is waning.

The poll surveyed 506 people and has a margin of error of four percentage points.

Until recently, the government has maintained at least a plurality in support of the negotiations with the PLO — usually hovering around 48 per cent.

At the time of the signing of the Declaration of Principles last September, 62 per cent supported the accord.

War criminals made Italy their home: report

Nazis lived with impunity

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Nine Nazi war criminals currently live or have lived with impunity in Italy since World War II, according to a report published in the Milan newspaper Corriere della Sera.

The war criminals are "nine mysteries to which Italy also has to respond," wrote the author of the article, Riccardo Orizio.

He quoted former SS officer Erich Priebke, discovered in Argentina earlier last month and wanted in Italy on war crimes charges, as telling an Italian interviewer:

"Why come all the way to Argentina just to find me? Many of my comrades are still in Italy; we have written to each other for years. If I am guilty, so are they. And they live there at your place."

Orizio's article, which provided details about the nine war criminals without giving the sources of his information, was published two days after Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal reiterated his charge that Italy had for decades ignored Nazi criminals living on its soil.

Wiesenthal told Italy's ANSA news agency that in 1967 he provided Italian authorities with a list of 66 residents of the Tirolean Alps suspected of war crimes, adding that he had asked the Italians for witnesses and documentation. The Tirolean region includes parts of Italy and Austria.

"Our letter never had an answer, and in the 1970s research (on these people) was suspended," he told ANSA.

Federico Steinhaus, president of the Jewish Community in Merano, in the South Tirol, and an expert on Nazi activities in that part of northern Italy, was quoted as saying that as far as he knew, these 66 people were all Austrian citizens.

He said, however, that a number of senior Nazis were known to live in northern Italy, although none had been convicted of any war crime.

The list published by Corriere della Sera included:

• Erich Raja (or Rajakowitsch), an Austrian who was involved with the deportation of Jews from Holland and Czechoslovakia. He was also involved with ghettos and concentration camps in Poland and Italy.

The newspaper said he lived until 1963 in Milan, where he carried on an import-export business. He died in Austria in 1964.

• Anton Malloth, former SS officer condemned to death in Czechoslovakia for war crimes in the concentration camp at Litomerice. Corriere della Sera said he lived for years in Merano.

• Conrad Geng, an SS officer who operated in Italy in 1943-1944 and specialized in killing handicapped people and invalids. Corriere della Sera said that after the war he settled in Milan, where he worked for the German consulate until the mid-1970s. He was transferred to France, but on his retirement, the newspaper said, he returned to Italy, where he died in 1980.

• Anton Burger, a deputy of Adolf Hitler's chief aide, Adolf Eichmann. Corriere della Sera said he was believed to have bought a vacation house in northern Italy. This was never investigated, the newspaper reported. Burger died a few months ago.

• Josip Susanski, Jan Griska, Alexander Mihalic and Misha Komalsky were Ukrainians who were guards at the Treblinka death camp. They were transferred in 1944 to the Risiera concentration camp near Trieste to help kill about 4,000 Jews, partisans and handicapped people.

Corriere della Sera quoted an unidentified Trieste magistrate as saying the four lived "tranquilly" in Trieste after the war. Mihalic died in 1985 and the others left the city. But, the newspaper said, it was believed that other Ukrainian guards from Risiera still lived in Trieste.

• Heinrich Kac, whom the newspaper described as a Yugoslav Nazi who fled to Argentina on a Red Cross passport — as Priebke had done. But the newspaper report stated that Kac returned to Italy in 1960 and asked for Italian citizenship.

"It is not clear if he obtained it," the report said, "but he has remained in our country and managed to have all traces of himself lost."

Australia declines to investigate deportee

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY — Despite calls by the Australian Jewish community for a complete investigation, authorities have announced they will not pursue the case against an alleged Nazi war criminal recently deported here from the United States.

When Konrad Kalejs, 80, arrived in mid-April, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry wrote to the Australian government arguing that "there is a compelling case" to "consider all remedies available" if grounds are found to prosecute Kalejs in this country.

But last week, the Australian Federal Police declared that his case will not be pursued.

After the dissolution last year of a special unit that had been established to prosecute alleged Nazi war criminals, the federal police became the only Australian institution with the authority to investigate such allegations.

In a brief statement issued in Canberra, federal police announced they had "made an assessment and took the decision not to mount an investigation."

In 1988, Australian war crimes legislation was amended to allow trials of individuals living in Australia against whom there was evidence of involvement in crimes against humanity during the Nazi occupation of Europe.

The amendments were modeled partly on Canada's laws, which were changed a few years earlier to permit trials of those suspected of war crimes committed outside Canada but which would have been crimes had they been committed inside Canada's borders.

In Australia, past federal police investigations into Nazi war criminals have been shelved due to inadequate resources.

Kalejs immigrated to Australia from Germany after World War II and became a naturalized Australian citizen in the 1950s.

He immigrated to the United States in 1959 and omitted any reference to his wartime membership in the Arajs Kommando, a mobile killing unit in Nazi-occupied Latvia.

Isi Leibler, president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, described last week's decision by the federal police not to pursue the case as "a bitter pill to swallow.

"This final episode of Australian government action concerning Nazi war criminals alleged to have enjoyed many years in free, democratic Australia, reinforces the fact that investigations should have taken place 40 years ago, when the outcome would have been decidedly different," he said.

Case Challenges IDF on Jericho

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force (IDF) has no right to keep Israelis out of Jericho, since it has given up control over the city, a petition to Israel's Supreme Court charged last week.

In his petition, Itamar Ben-Gvir said that since the signing of the Gaza/Jericho Accord, he has twice been refused entry into Jericho by the Army, on the grounds that Jericho was a closed military area.

"The approach whereby on the one hand, [the army] no longer controls Jericho, but on the other, it behaves like a sovereign power, is unacceptable," Ben-Gvir wrote in his petition. "From the moment the IDF transferred its military and civilian authorities to the Arabs, it can no longer determine who may or may not enter the city."

Last week, the court also considered a petition from a Jewish settler who asked for the return of his army-issue weapon, which was confiscated after the Hebron massacre.

Award for Arafat Killer?

JERUSALEM — Deputy Mayor Shmuel Meir was making a "private statement" when he called for the Distinguished Citizen of Jerusalem Award to go to whoever assassinates PLO leader Yasser Arafat, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert said last week.

Olmert declined to condemn Meir or comment further on the matter, according to a City Hall statement.

Meir, an outspoken right-wing leader in the city council, called for the prestigious award to go to the person who killed Arafat the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz reported.

Olmert has vowed to help organize a massive demonstration if the government gives the go-ahead for the PLO chairman to visit the city. Such a visit, however, is not expected soon, according to both Israeli and PLO officials.

Radical Group Jams Radio Signals

JERUSALEM — The radical Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command is jamming Israel Radio's Arabic broadcasts in the Galilee, Syria and Lebanon, according to Israel Broadcasting Authority officials.

The PFLP-GC's station in southern Syria broadcasts inflammatory anti-Israel propaganda every night for a half-hour, following which it jams Israel Radio's Arab language signals, officials said.

Israel Radio said the interference was apparently aimed at destroying the influence its broadcasts have. A recent survey showed that more than 70 per cent of Israeli Arabs listen to Israel Radio's Arabic-language broadcasts.

Another survey of Arabs in the territories found that 90 per cent listen to the station, while estimates show that nearly 50 per cent of Syrians listen intermittently to the Israeli station.

Germany Toughens Hate Laws

BONN — The lower house of the German parliament has approved legislation that would toughen penalties for violence perpetrated by right-wing extremists.

The legislation, adopted last month by the Bundestag, increases the maximum penalty for racially-motivated assaults from three to five years.

It also would punish Holocaust deniers with sentences of up to three years in prison.

The new legislation must still be ratified by the Bundesrat, the upper house, representing Germany's 16 federal states.

On the same day the crime bill was approved, it was discovered that neo-Nazis had desecrated a Jewish cemetery in the Bavarian city of Hoechberg.

Thirteen tombstones were found overturned and vandalized.

And earlier last month, police detained two high school students suspected of desecrating a Jewish cemetery in the resort town of Bad Kissingen.

Leaders Lukewarm on New President

BERLIN — Jewish community leaders were noncommittal on last week's election of conservative Judge Roman Herzog to succeed Richard von Weizsacker as Germany's seventh president.

Comments from both Jerzy Kanal, head of Berlin's Jewish community and Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, showed that Herzog was not their first choice.

"I don't take it as a tragedy," Kanal said.

Herzog was strongly backed by Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

The role of president in Germany is largely ceremonial. But during the past decade, von Weizsacker won over Jewish groups by reminding Germans time and again not to forget their wartime past and to warn against a resurgence of xenophobia in the country.

Bubis called Herzog's election "a good choice, but it would have been equally good for me if [Social Democratic leader Johannes] Rau or (Free Democratic Party candidate) Hildegard Hamm-Bruecher had been elected."

Marker for Touvier's Victims Destroyed

PARIS — A month after war-time French militia leader Paul Touvier was sentenced to life imprisonment for ordering the execution of seven Jews in 1944, a plaque memorializing the victims has been destroyed.

The marble plaque was torn from the wall where the Jews were shot at the cemetery in Rillieux-la-Pape, near Lyon in southeastern France. Pieces of the plaque were found scattered in a nearby field.

Marcel Andre, mayor of Rillieux-la-Pape, promised that a new plaque would be unveiled as soon as possible.

French Vets Protest SS Soldiers

PARIS — French veteran groups reacted with outrage recently after former German SS soldiers laid wreaths at two cemeteries on the Normandy coast where their fallen comrades are buried.

In a ceremony late last month, some 15 former members of two SS Panzer divisions left wreaths at the cemeteries, as the mayors of nearby villages looked on.

The former SS soldiers even signed the official visitors' book at one of the nearby villages.

One of the mayors explained that he did not know who the soldiers were, saying, "It is not written on their foreheads that they are former SS soldiers."

He said he only realized who the soldiers were after reading the inscription on one of the wreaths: "From veterans of the Waffen SS in memory of the dead of 1944."

A group of French war veterans termed the incident "a catastrophe.

"If they (the SS soldiers) led the mayors on, then they were acting as they did in the old days. Otherwise, the mayors should resign since they should have canceled the ceremonies," the group said.

Japanese Throng to Holocaust Exhibit

TOKYO — In its first week on display at Tokyo's City Hall, The Courage to Remember, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's acclaimed exhibit on the Holocaust, attracted over 50,000 viewers, the centre said recently.

The expanded Japanese-language version of the exhibit includes never before seen, original letters written by Anne Frank and her sister Margot in 1940, as well as a special panel about the heroic exploits of Sempo Sugihara, the Japanese diplomat who help rescue thousands of Jews during World War II.

Over 2,500 people viewed the exhibit on its first day last month, including Sugihara's widow, who toured the presentation with U.S. ambassador to Japan, Walter Mondale. Also on hand were Israel's charge d'affaires, Mordechai Amichai, and Tokyo's deputy governor.

Steinsaltz Unveils Russian Talmud

MOSCOW — Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, the world-renowned scholar and educator who translated the Talmud into everyday language, was in Russia last month to mark the publication of the first volume of a new Russian edition of the Talmud.

The volume is the first Russian Talmud produced since 1917, and was created with the sponsorship of the Russian Academy of Sciences and financial support from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

The initial print run is 6,000 copies. The Russian Talmud is expected eventually to run to at least 10 volumes.

Front Line

It's important to go through life like a mentsh

Long-time CJN columnist J. B. Salsberg — and his Uncle Eliezer — made a rare appearance in the pages of The CJN in the issue of May 19. Fittingly, in light of their devotion to mameloshen, it was in the bi-weekly column Yiddishe Winkel.

Their thoughts on mentshlechkeit deserve wide circulation, and we are delighted to offer them to you, dear readers, in a translation by Gerry Kane, chair of the Committee for Yiddish of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

By J. B. SALSBERG

My uncle Eliezer, in one of his famous disquisitions, made the point to me that not every one of G-d's creations who walks around on two feet is a mentsh.

He himself, he said, is acquainted with many who could be described as mules, or pigs, or simply as animals. And, he further assures me that he also knows some who circulate amongst the common folk who could best be described as sly foxes or skunks.

As always, when I stop to consider my Uncle Eliezer's comments, I must admit he is right. To be a mentsh is no small accomplishment. To become a mentsh means achieving a high level in the tree of evolution — if not the highest level.

J.B. Salsberg

The question arises — in what context did this discussion with my uncle ensue? The answer is that it came out of several visits he made to Yiddish "Senior Citizens" clubs to whom he was invited to speak. These visits prompted him to come talk to me about the growing phenomena called Senior Citizens Clubs. As you well know, you can't hurry my Uncle Eliezer, so it was only after a few glasses of tea and lemon and some idle conversation, which took about two hours, that he was sufficiently ready to get into the meat of the subject that was truly on his mind.

First, he said, it must be admitted, that although not everything is rosy for older people, life today, in comparison to what it was, is a lot better — especially in wealthy countries like Canada.

A senior citizen today gets a pension — even though it would be better if it were higher. There's universal health care. And, here in Toronto, we have the marvellous Baycrest Centre, the Wagman Centre and the Bernard Betel Centre, which serve the older population with a dedicated corps of professionals and volunteers, and we are also witnessing the growth of senior citizens clubs amongst the synagogues, the National Council of Jewish Women and various secular community organizations.

All this activity truly means that we haven't abandoned the elderly. The opposite is true. There is a recognition that those who spent their years raising families and devoting themselves to the community and its institutions have properly earned the respect that is shown them in their senior years.

Secondly, we came to the conclusion, my Uncle Eliezer and I, that it is absolutely necessary, to remind everyone, again and again, how important it is to establish the conditions which allow one to live his or her life out like a mentsh.

What does this mean? It means that the elderly person must not allow himself to feel like a square peg in a round hole or someone who has nothing to contribute to the community. A person whose health is still viable must continue to be part of the vital, creative community which he helped build and to which he still has something to contribute. So that when his time comes — and let us not fool ourselves, the time does come — he will know that through his interest in life and his efforts to improve the human condition, he (or she) has left the world a bit better place than when he first came into it.

That's what it means to live like a mentsh. It means wanting to know and wanting to contribute and wanting to influence the course of life as long as you've got a breath to breathe. That's what should be the focus of every elderly person. To give up, to allow yourself to passively wait out the end of your days, is to give up on your humanity, on your mentshlechkeit. It is that kind of existence against which everyone must struggle.

People with potential we were born and people with potential we will live out our lives.

Can Arafat lead his people to a peaceful future?

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

In Gaza and in Jericho, local Palestinian commanders are now struggling with the challenges of their recently acquired new status. In Gaza they face their own unruly and utterly frustrated constituency and in Jericho they face the daily efforts of a handful of Israeli hotheads to disrupt the fragile arrangements. The Israeli army is very controlled and the impression is that, on the practical and local levels, down-to-earth realism is stronger than rhetoric. But the uphill road gets steeper and implementation has only just started.

Disruptive rhetoric is polluting the air, which is also full of other dangers. Compared with these, Yasser Arafat's absurd bombshells launched from a Johannesburg mosque tell more about his own state of mind than they are relevant to the pacification process itself. The PLO leader has severe adjustment problems. He is now being called upon to abandon his glamorous self-appointment as the "president" of a country in the making and expected to assume the pedestrian, if temporary role of administrator of the two chunks of partial autonomy — and he is not ready for it. All his life he thrived on manipulation in the twilight world of imaginary statesmanship. Then, when his career had reached one of its lowest points, he astonished the world scene with the notorious handshake in Washington, only to relapse shortly afterward into his old, self-destructive style.

The negotiations over the implementation of the first instalment of autonomy were hard and the continuation may prove to be even harder. But Arafat is personally responsible for the chaotic unpreparedness of his followers in the territories to assume their duties once agreement was reached. He is also to blame for the financial difficulties which the autonomy faces now that the PLO coffers are empty. He has still not regained the support of the wealthy Arab countries which he antagonized when he sided with Saddam Hussein during the Gulf War. And he has failed to impose the hegemony of his Tunis-based group on his representatives in the territories. The contest with Hamas is not his only problem. Many of his most devoted followers were gradually estranged by his endless personal manipulations. He, who had managed to remain for decades the undisputed symbol of Palestinian nationhood, is close to becoming a liability to his cause. In a very pungent editorial, the New York Times urged him "to soon resolve his lingering identity crisis and decide who he really is: globe-trotting guerrilla leader or chief-administrator of Palestinian self-rule." Otherwise, says the editorial, "he will torpedo his most important achievement — negotiated autonomy and an end to Israeli military rule." The odds are that Arafat will not decide and may even sooner or later be outmaneuvered by his own erratic manipulations.

Yeshayahu Anug

Still, Arafat's threats to wage a holy war — jihad — for Jerusalem and his reminder that in Muslim tradition peace agreements with enemies can be broken — both statements anchored in Islamic theological double-talk and thus open to different interpretations — have not helped Rabin to keep alive the confidence of the Israeli public in the viability of the peace accord with the PLO. But the official reaction in Israel to Arafat's outbursts was, on the whole, contained. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, asked for his comment on the issue of Jerusalem, replied simply that while the political aspect was a closed subject, the religious aspects were open to negotiation.

Rabin is utterly disgusted with Arafat's behavior, but not discouraged by the ups and downs of the peace process itself. He is at the same time more straightforward than before in the handling of Jewish extremists. This group which has recently adopted new pathetic methods of action threatens to impose its own tactics on the official opposition, whose leadership is by definition more cautious and controlled. But the temptation to make the best use of the growing public disenchantment with Arafat's PLO for the purpose of discrediting and eventually toppling the government which deals with him is too difficult to resist. In a tone of "we told you so" the Likud reminded the public of its own steady refusal to deal with Arafat. But this reaction was as predictable as Arafat's legendary dishonesty and one can hardly imagine that the Likud would support the government's peace policy if Arafat were as honest as Mother Theresa. Nobody here knows exactly where the Israeli public stands vis-a-vis the chances of the peace plan. The general impression is that the process will somehow move ahead slowly on its own steam, regardless of existing and future impediments.

Rabin himself is not at his best these days and while his actions and tactics have not lost their pragmatic effectiveness, his language now reflects impatience and stress. The conduct of the peace process is not the only headache on his internal agenda. His government is barely surviving its frequent non-confidence tests. He must also handle the crisis in his party which is not ready to adjust to the poor showing of its official candidate in the recent Histadrut elections, but is at the same time still reluctant to return to the fold his victorious rival in the same elections, Chaim Ramon, who was one of the party's most promising young leaders and who had no intention of leaving the party. Ramon's public following is more solid than that of the defeated Histadrut bosses and this is perhaps the reason for the deadlock. A grave financial crisis in the Histadrut-affiliated medicare organization, which cares for 65 per cent of Israel's population, is now threatening its very survival and aggravating the situation of the government.

It is possible that parallel to the autonomy process with the Palestinians, which will somehow go on, the Israeli-Syrian sector will at last surface from its protracted anonymity. This could well happen during the next visit of Secretary of State Warren Christopher who is scheduled to come on June 12. But even if left with the Palestinians as the only partners to a settlement, the Israeli side will have to resolve one of the most striking paradoxes of the whole enterprise: It needs a strong Palestinian counterpart and this is a serious consideration which makes it tactically counter-productive to totally discredit the PLO. However, by acting on this premise only, Israel is in effect strengthening Arafat's position regardless of his unpredictable behavior.

But this is not only Israel's dilemma. Arafat's politics have recently become a source of increasing Palestinian frustration too. In the end it will be for them to decide whether, under the circumstances, Arafat will be the man who will lead them into a more decent future in parts of the disputed land.

When a jihad is not really a jihad

By RABBI ROBERT L. WOLKOFF

The recent flap concerning Yasser Arafat's call for a "jihad" to liberate Jerusalem is a study of double-entendre that would have driven even Freud into analysis.

On the face of it, the statement, "You have to come and to fight and to start a jihad to liberate Jerusalem, your third [holiest] shrine . . . The jihad will continue. Jerusalem is for all the Muslim nation . . . our main battle is Jerusalem," hardly seems ridden with ambiguity. But in the bizarre rhetoric of the Middle East — particularly the Middle East as seen with Western eyes — nothing is as simple as it seems.

Or is it?

To the Western media, Arafat denied that he "advocated violence," when he called for "jihad" in a South African mosque. He was, once again, "misinterpreted." He told a news conference he could use the word "jihad" as a peaceful religious term as in the phrases: "I will continue my jihad for peace," or "I will continue my jihad for Christians and Muslims and Jews to pray together in Jerusalem."

Arafat explained he was speaking in an "Islamic religious way." In that he was absolutely right. The problem, of course, is that in much of the Muslim world, there is nothing more "religious" than killing infidel opponents.

There is a (small) kernel of truth in the assertion by Arafat that "jihad" means "inward spiritual struggle." At various times and places in Muslim history that has indeed been the word's primary meaning. However, the number of people today, in the area stretching from Morocco to Afghanistan, who believe that is what Arafat meant would fit into the back seat of Arafat's limousine with room to spare.

In the West, on the other hand, there is a dangerous gullibility in regard to "jihad." During the buildup to the war in the Persian Gulf, I participated in a European "peace seminar." As usual for such gatherings, emphasis was placed on "fascistoid America's imperialistic schemes," rather than on any fault, real or imagined, of Third World dictators. A speaker on Arab Political Rhetoric attempted to downplay Saddam Hussein's repeated calls for "jihad." He asserted confidently to the audience that they surely were unaware of the "true meaning" of "jihad."

Unbeknownst to him, all the previous speakers had made the same point. His surprise was therefore tangible when, in response to his challenge, the entire "herd of independent minds" (as Harold Rosenberg would say) thundered "inner spiritual struggle!"

The remarkably artificial verbal sleight of hand on the part of the "clarifiers" serves to underscore the significance of the Israeli reaction. Shimon Peres called Arafat's statement "astonishing and unacceptable . . . A call to 'jihad' stands purely against all of what we have agreed upon." Yitzhak Rabin pointed out that less than a week before his "jihad" call, Arafat had signed a document agreeing not to use violence or terror in the struggle for Jerusalem.

Had there been the slightest interest by the Israeli leadership in abrogating the peace process, they could have done so. After all, the argument by Ehud Olmert that "a partner to negotiations for peace cannot at the same time declare a holy war against his partner," does seem apposite. That Olmert's view is a partisan one — he is, after all, an opposition leader, not to mention the mayor of Jerusalem, and thus directly in the path of the approaching "jihad" — does nothing to detract from the cogency of his remarks.

A certain absurdity in Israel's diplomatic scramble to sanitize Arafat's call for "jihad" was therefore inevitable. Consider, for example, the profound insight by Peres that "a 'holy war' could derail the entire peace process."

Well, yes, one might suppose it could.

The willingness to turn somersaults in order to accept Arafat's "clarifications" should hardly be taken to mean that the Israeli leadership has any illusions concerning what Arafat said — or meant — or, least of all, how his call for "jihad" was perceived in the Arab world. How then should Israel's policy be explained?

The Israeli leadership is counting on what, from the beginning, has been their "ace in the hole" — the insufferable burden of trying to govern the Palestinians. Now that Arafat has his feet firmly planted in the quicksand which is Gaza, it is reasoned, he's going to need all the "jihad" he can muster just to get the garbage collected. Jerusalem will just have to wait.

Perhaps this strategy will work, perhaps not. Nagging doubts should persist, however. In Oslo, Arafat said: "We promise you that we will continue this line (of peace) in spite of all the challenges we face."

What could that statement possibly mean? His biggest challenge is that the advocates of peace among the Arab leadership are light years ahead of the curve vis-a-vis the Arab masses, for whom "jihad" means nothing other than good old holy war.

To say the least, Arafat did nothing to narrow the gap.

Which puts the statement of Secretary of State Warren Christopher in an entirely new light. "It's important for him, as a significant leader on the world scene, to understand the consequences of remarks that he made," Christopher said.

The frightening possibility is quite simply that he does. Better than anyone.

Superhighway on-ramp

Canada's information superhighway is rolling forward, and for those not connected with the techno-world of big business and corporate dealings, the concept is staggering.

The Stentor Alliance, a group made up of nine regional telephone companies led by Bell Canada, will spend $8 billion over the next 10 years to link Canadians coast to coast by telephone lines. Called the Beacon Initiative, this information highway will deliver videos-on-demand, provide electronic shopping and banking in the home, link computers in schools and hospitals and deliver videoconferencing and other services to businesses.

Canada has to seize a new national dream of a knowledge-based society — "A Mari usque ad Mare" — "From sea to sea" — and the information highway is a critical element in this dream. The proposed technology will not just attract software jockeys and chip designers; it will be used by all.

We must rely on a pan-Canadian spirit of cooperation; and partnership between industry and government is essential if Canada's potential is to be realized.

Experts in the field say that industry's role is to plan, design, implement and develop the networks, services and applications that will constitute the information highway.

Government's role is to create a more favorable policy, tax and regulatory environment; to promote policies that foster competition and open access; to provide funding for demonstration projects; and to support the information highway by using its services. Both will have to ensure that the highway is widely available and affordable.

Canada is standing at the gates of the global village; passing through those gates has the promise of transforming the economy and enhancing the quality of our lives.

Our trading partners, notably Israel, are moving quickly to install advanced information infrastructures. If Canada does not keep pace, Canadians will lose any hope of gaining a competitive edge in the international marketplace.

The signing, this week, of the Canada Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), the first ever, offers Canadian firms a unique opportunity to develop information technology in cooperation with a country that has long been a leader in the field.

This is an area of great opportunity for Canadian-Israeli partnership.

We should be prepared to exploit it.

(Next week: More on CIIRDF)

Abduction was justified

Israel had no alternative but to abduct Mustafa Dirani, the leader of a Lebanese Shi'ite group, who has been implicated in the capture of Israeli navigator Ron Arad.

Dirani, plucked by Israeli commandos from his home in the Lebanese village of Kasr Naba on May 21, was in charge of security for the Amal militia in October 1986 when his men captured Arad after he had bailed out of his malfunctioning aircraft in southern Lebanon. According to Israeli reports, Dirani — who now heads an outfit called Faithful Resistance — sold Arad to Iranian forces in Lebanon. So it stands to reason that Dirani may be in a position to pinpoint Arad's whereabouts.

As Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin declared last week, Dirani will not be used as a bargaining chip like Sheik Abdel Karim Obeid — who was kidnapped by Israel in 1989 for a similar reason — but solely as a source of information.

The Israeli government believes that Arad, unlike five other soldiers missing in action in Lebanon, is alive. Arad, who has been variously reported in Lebanon, Iran and Syria, was last heard from in 1987, when his wife received his first — and so far only — letter via the Red Cross. Since then, his fate has remained a mystery, as well as a source of anguish for his family.

Unrelenting in its efforts to bring Arad back home, Israel seems to have exhausted every possible diplomatic avenue to gain his freedom. In 1992, much to Israel's bitter disappointment, all the Western hostages held in Lebanon, save the Israelis, were released. Subsequent attempts by the United Nations to right this injustice fizzled. Five months ago, President Hafez al-Assad promised U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher that Syria would investigate the matter. But Assad, too, has come up short. Recently, the Iranian foreign minister, Ali Akbar Velayati, claimed that Arad was not in Iran's hands.

Facing a dead-end in its search for Arad, Israel, therefore, had no choice but to resort to extraordinary means to obtain further information about him. It is to be hoped that Dirani will provide the clues. If he doesn't, which may well be the case, Israel will be justified if it continues doing whatever it can to free Arad from captivity.

DON'T BREAK UP CANADA

Re your article of May 12 (Montreal edition) P.Q. nominates first Sephardi Jew for riding.

I could not help but wonder about the exact reason why people like Cohen, Elbaz and Guessous and their followers find this society in Canada so intolerable.

What degree of disenchantment caused them to direct their energies to break this country apart after choosing to live here? Were they subjected to educational restrictions? Harassed because of language choice? Perhaps belittled by the "Anglais." Could these people truly believe that Quebecers will enjoy a better lifestyle in a sovereign state? Is more freedom and prosperity evident elsewhere?

Suffice that too many of the "pur laine" are actively striving to bring a rupture and with it political mayhem and chaos to a civil and relatively stable society, must those who were given the opportunity to live and establish a future in a country which compares most favorably with the best in the world find "honor" as a Jew in being chosen to help tear it down?

As I do not wish to witness the dismemberment of this established and respected society I will cast my vote in favor of unity with the rest of Canada as will the great majority of Jews in Quebec. I will also offer my services to Gerald Tremblay in his bid to win the riding. I hope other people will be motivated to do the same.

LIKED A SHAYNA MAIDEL

I take exception to the review of A Shayna Maidel by Ben Rose.

Firstly, I can only believe that Mr. Rose is a very young man and did not live in a Jewish community during the 1930s. The 70-year-old father Mordechai Weiss is totally believable. I myself knew several Jewish men exactly like him when I was a youngster. These men never allowed themselves to show much emotion — but Mordechai did care enough to look for his daughter. As for not borrowing money to bring his family to the United States — that was also typical of men of his ilk. He could not foresee what was to come and borrowing money was against his nature. Harvey Atkin was absolutely perfect in his portrayal of Mordechai.

As for Rose, why would she not be upset at having her lifestyle invaded upon — without her permission. She probably got out from under her father's thumb, set up her own life — not kosher and not observing Shabbat — with great difficulty. All of a sudden her independence is threatened. Shouldn't she be upset under these circumstances?

By the way, I felt the method of portraying Luisa's fantasies was very clear and totally understood by myself and all of my party — a group of 14 ladies all in their 60s! Obviously Mr. Rose did not live through the war years and before; if he had, he too would have understood this play.

DISPELL THE LIES

I visited the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington and was there from 1 p.m. until closing time at 5 p.m. Because of its scope and comprehensiveness, I was unable to view the entire exhibit.

I have been haunted ever since that day by the museum and its contents. As a Yiddish teacher for many years in Montreal, I've had occasion to study the Holocaust and subsequently to teach it. As a Jew, I have visited several other Holocaust museums in various countries throughout the world. Why then did the museum in Washington have such a profound effect on me?

The answer came to me a few days ago. The Holocaust Memorial Museum, and the manner in which the theme and subject matter are shown, creates a powerful audiovisual, hands-on experience. How fortunate for the citizens of the United States to be able to claim it as their own.

I strongly recommend that all American students of high school or college age be taught the Holocaust as portrayed in the museum. The course should be mandatory, part of every high school curriculum throughout the United States. Where possible, a field trip to the museum should be included in the course. Such a course would be a significant step in dispelling the lies and propaganda of the historical revisionists.

As an educator of many years' experience, both in secular and Jewish studies, I know that this course must become a reality. Americans now have the resource — the Holocaust Memorial Museum. They also have the important beneficiaries — all future generations of American students.

LET'S DANCE

Why should every social, religious, political, ethnic, service, international, national, or regional organization schedule an annual Assisi Underground dinner-dance?

The Assisi Underground was made up of many brave Italians who shielded Italian Jews from the Nazis during World War II.

The annual Assisi Underground dinner-dances would properly honor the memory of these courageous people.

The dinner-dance proceeds, of course, would also better enable these organizations to continue their other good works.

Let's dance!

DINNER IS KEY TO HEART

It was interesting to have found two articles on heart disease, both on the same page, of your May 5 issue. But it's disturbing that health writers seldom go beyond reporting the latest bit of research on some promising new technique or procedure, because the principal cause of and the key to winning the battle against heart disease is as clear as our dinner plate.

But don't take my word for it. Look at what Dr. William Castelli, the director of the Framingham Heart Study — most extensive heart research project ever undertaken — has to say about how diet plays a vital role: "Vegetarians have the best diet. They have a fraction of our heart attack rate..." Also, look at what William Roberts, editor-in-chief of the American Journal of Cardiology, says about food and heart disease: "When we kill animals to eat them, they end up killing us because their flesh, which contains saturated fat and cholesterol, was never intended for human beings, who are natural herbivores."

Like a growing number of individuals, I've heard enough about all the effort that goes into treating heart disease. Let's see more about the power of effective preventative measures, such as a switch to vegetarian foods.

Butt out, please, you're too old

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Readers of this column and of the daily press may know that for some time I have been an advocate for certain revisions of Ontario's transport rules. The issue has to do with the public's perception of older people — in Ontario and elsewhere.

It all began when I became aware that at age 80 I had to be retested by the Ministry of Transport. They wanted to make sure that I hadn't lost my marbles and still knew how to use my car. I went to the testing place in blissful ignorance of what awaited me, only to find out that it was a degrading and depressing experience. I was treated like a child; my waiting for hours was immaterial to the officials; and altogether I felt that my dignity had been seriously tampered with. Subsequently I wrote in the Toronto Globe & Mail about it, and it brought in a flood of letters, including one from Mr. D. J. Janigan of Ottawa.

He is not anywhere near that magic age when he has to take his own test, but he was intrigued by the problem I presented, and he resolved to do something about it. Meanwhile he has widely written about it in the daily press, become involved the province's senior organizations, and has shown how a single person can begin to move the involved and cumbersome apparatus of the bureaucracy.

Rabbi Plaut

I am glad to say that, slowly but certainly, the wheels of progress are turning. When I took my test the year following, things were greatly improved, and I acknowledged it in an article in the Toronto Star.

Subsequently, I received a letter from the Hon. Gilles Pouliot, minister of transportation.

"I was pleased to read," he wrote, "that you noticed improvements in the service provided by the Ministry when you last took your annual driving test . . .

"I acknowledge your point that the practice of retesting based on a chronological age is not ideal. The Ministry faces a great challenge in balancing the individual's right for personal mobility with the need to insure the safety of all users of our roads. The annual retesting of senior drivers allows the Ministry to make an assessment of whether a driver's abilities have been visibly affected by aging factors.

"The subject of how best to detect the effect of aging on driving requires further study, and I am pleased to report that there are several long-term research initiatives related to older drivers underway in the Ministry. As we analyse results from these studies, we will consider making some policy changes with respect to licensing older drivers.

"The Ministry will be conducting a pilot study this year to assess the effectiveness of the current retest compared to a group re-education session. Over the longer term we will be looking at more comprehensive ways of screening and diagnosing older driver problems, and assessing additional retraining options."

Indeed, change seems to be in the wind. During my latest excursion to the testing place, I had nothing whatsoever to complain about, except that I was tested at all. Instead of surliness there was courtesy, and the reception I received was pleasant and encouraging rather than conveying the attitude that I should butt out, and the earlier the better. Others who have written or spoken to me on the subject also report a marked improvement in the attitude of the testers and related personnel.

As far as I am concerned, all people should be retested from time to time. As Mr. Janigan has pointed out, functional status of the individual is a better predictor of driving performance than the driver's age.

All of the above has to do, of course, with a much larger problem: the perception which people have of their elders. The mental image of "little old ladies in tennis shoes" is applied to men in the same fashion and stererotypes us older people as basically incompetent and slightly ludicrous. Economists, in addition, suggest that the earlier we butt out altogether, the better off the whole country will be. That is why they send us a seniors card from Ottawa which shows parliament at night, dark and with all but one light already out.

I got the message, but I am not complying if I can help it.

Lost Jewish 'tribes' may try to rejoin mainstream

By CARL ALPERT

Since American Jews seem in no hurry to immigrate to Israel, and the remaining Jews of the former Soviet Union are for the most part still hesitant, the only remaining source of large-scale aliyah would appear to be the descendants of the Ten Lost Tribes, those who were exiled from the country by King Sargon of Assyria 2,700 years ago.

While they have long been considered "lost," evidence in recent years has "discovered" these tribes in many parts of the world. If substantiated, their claims to the right of return are no less valid than those of us who are descendants of the Jews of the Kingdom of Judah who were exiled to Babylon 100 years later, some of whom returned under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The immigration of the Jews of Ethiopia has lent credibility to the possibility of return by other exotic tribes. Rabbi Eliahu Avichail of Jerusalem, who has dedicated his life to seeking out the remnants of these lost Jews and bringing them home, has located a clan in the remote mountains between India and Burma, which he has traced back to the Biblical tribe of Menashe. The tribesmen bear names like Judah, Rebekah and Joel, which have been handed down for generations. Streets in their mountain villages have long been named for Jerusalem, Hebron and other sites in the Holy Land.

They never got along well with their Muslim neighbors, and now look forward to rejoining the mainstream of the Jewish people. More than 80 of them have already arrived in Israel and have undergone Jewish education and formal reconversion. Courses are also being given in Burma for hundreds of others, who will soon be en route. There are 750,000 members of the tribe.

It may be truly said that this clan are our blood brothers, for when a group of Arab terrorists attacked a Jewish settlement in Gaza about a month ago and stabbed 19-year-old Orli Menashe, they were shedding the blood of one of the members of this group.

Evidence points also to Pakistan, where the Pathan tribes speak a language which contains many Hebrew words. They observe rigid dietary laws and follow customs like circumcision on the eighth day, candle lighting before the Sabbath, and other rites. There are said to be 15 million Pathans, today mostly Muslims.

One case has already come before the Israeli courts. Tsima Oniyoli, 47, a member of the Ibo tribe in Africa (10 million strong) filed suit to be recognized as a genuine descendant of the lost Jews. He maintains that King Solomon brought his people to Jerusalem to build the Temple, and they all converted to Judaism, later returning to Africa as Jews.

In the Sichuan province of China, near the border with Tibet, are about 300,000 Chinese members of the Chiang tribe, who likewise follow many Jewish traditions. In southern Africa a British professor has discovered the Lemba tribes, scattered through South Africa, Zimbabwe, Malawi and Mozambique, who claim relationship to the Jews of Ethiopia.

The case for the American Indians was set forth as long ago as 1827 by American Jew Mordecai Manual Noah, who wrote a treatise entitled The Evidences of the American Indians being the Descendants of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel. There are Cherokee Indians in America today who believe that theory, and seek contacts with Israel.

Some 10 years ago Joseph Eidelberg wrote The Japanese and the Ten Lost Tribes, adducing both historical and linguistic evidence. How many Japanese are there?

The late Dr. Haim Sheba believed Armenians were descended from one of the tribes, and conducted tests for possible genetic similarities. Reports are on record of Indians in Ecuador and Brazil (tribes of Reuben and Levi) praying in Hebrew.

In the 12th century CE, Benjamin of Tudela told of finding Jews in Kurdistan, Persia and Iraq who considered themselves descendants of the tribes of Gad, Reuben, Menashe, Zebulun, Asher and Naftali.

The Maoris of New Zealand, the gypsies of Europe, the ancient Mayan culture of Mexico have all at one time or another been singled out on the basis of "evidence."

All this is a fascinating historical game, but there are some who see in it serious political implications, based on the Ethiopian and Falash-Mura precedent. If the claims of these lost tribes are to be met in any sizeable numbers, they say, Israel should not surrender land areas in Judea and Samaria, which will be required to house the vast immigration expected.

Minister of Absorption Yair Tsaban takes the matter seriously. "If we open Israel's gates to mass conversions based on myths and legends," he says, "it will change our national, cultural and historical character and that of the state we have established here."

No less an authority than the late president, Itzhak Ben-Zvi, gave credence to the theory that the native Arabs of Israel were actually descended from Jews who stayed after the destruction of the Temple, and were later converted to Islam. Think of the complications that creates!

What we really need are more Jewish videos

By ALLAN GOULD

Let's face it, friends: the videotape has changed our lives. (Although the polio vaccine was pretty good, too — and the Jews can be thanked for that, at least.)

Remember a decade ago? We would hear from a good friend about a "fabulous movie" that might vanish, if we didn't rush to the Cineplex and catch it. So, even if I had a book-deadline to meet, and my wife Merle had 250 high school English papers to grade by the next day, we'd drop everything and zoom to the movies. We sure didn't want to lose it forever.

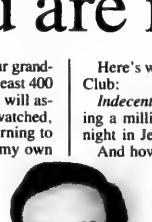
Ahh, but today, when we hear of a movie which is (supposed to be) superior, we just glance at each other, smile knowingly, and whisper confidently, and in unison, "We-can-always-wait-till-it's-out-on-video."

And we do, we do. Even better, we simply ignore it, when it first hits the video shelves, and wait another six months, until it's "free" — i.e., on pay-TV. Then we eagerly tape it, put it on a shelf, and then never watch it anyway — confident that, if we ever did find the free time (and we never do, and probably never will), it's there, in our possession, hovering on that shelf over our TV, if we ever wanted to view it. (And we won't, I can assure you with as much confidence as saying that Purim will come next Adar, and no sooner.)

What got me thinking about this was one of those ubiquitous ads for a major Video Club — much like a Book Club: You can collect six movies for 29 cents each! (And get two more for up to 70 per cent off!)

Now, that's a pretty good deal, you've got to admit — even if it means swearing on your grandzayde's grave that you'll have to buy at least 400 over the next 12 months — all of which will assuredly end up on your den shelves, unwatched, just like the 5,613 which are already turning to dust — while gathering the same — in my own library.

My question is: why own a videotape of a movie at all? Sure, my sweet teenaged daughter Elisheva has seen some movies a dozen times or more on our VCR — Annie (when she was a lot younger); Heathers; and some charming kid's film which I've never seen but she tells me is just right for her age group — it's called Silence of the Lambs, so I guess it's a movie about farm animals.



Allan Gould

Now, as the full-time author of over 20 books, I think that it's just wonderful that people buy books — and refer back to them, over the years. But what person in his/her right mind wants, or needs, to see The Bodyguard more than once? Heck, once was three times too many, as far as my wife and I were concerned. (Even if Whitney Houston will, truly, allllllwwaaaaaaayzzzzzzzlooooooo vvvvvve meeee-eeeee-eeeeee) (eeeeeeee-eeeeeeeee).

Look at libraries: When you take a book out, you have to read it within the three weeks that you possess it — or you feel like an idiot when you return it — gasp — unread. But a video? To own a video? That you'll probably never watch?

Ahh, but not if we had a Jewish Video Club — with movies which truly spoke to us, and to us alone! That's what we need: Jewish movies, worthy of being viewed in a Jewish home.

Here's what I'd like to read about in my Video Club:

Indecent Proposal: About Yasser Arafat paying a million dollars for the right to sleep one night in Jerusalem.

And how about a passionate movie about the struggle of a small Canadian community to organize a regular, daily minyan: A Few Good Men.

Then, there's Sleepless in Kiryat Shmoneh: An Israeli couple tries to get some shut-eye, but the Ketusha rockets keep shattering their dreams.

The Unforgiven: A synagogue board finally agrees to write a new contract with their rabbi, after much acrimonious debate.

The Neverending Story: A history of anti-Semitism, alas, alas.

White Men Can't Daven: — A scathing satire on Ashkenazi religious practice, filmed by an up-and-coming Sephardi director.

The Silence of the Lambchops: The tragedy of how it's practically impossible to get fresh kosher lamb in Toronto.

Edward Scissorhands: A Mohel's Story. Don't ask.

The Jew of the Nile: The True Story of Moshe Rabbenu.

Raiders of the Lost Ark: The Torah is stolen from the little minyan's synagogue. Who is responsible? A mystery.

The Longest Day: A documentary on Yom Kippur. Or maybe it's about the 24 hours leading up to the first seder of Passover; I'm not sure.

To Kill a Mockingbird: How to ge-shechte poultry, kosher-style.

Florence of Arabia: The never-before-told story of a Jewish woman in North Africa, and her adventurous Hadassah chapter there.

The King and I: that great musical about Shimon Peres's frequent secret meetings with Hussein of Jordan.

Look Who's Talking Too Much: about the Knesset in action.

A Mecheetza Runs Through It: — a documentary on Orthodox prayer.

Seven Brides for Seven Brothers: A touching musical about a bunch of Russian olim to Israel, who had never managed to get properly married back in the U.S.S.R., receiving proper ketubot.

How the West Bank Was Won: The Six Day War on video.

Honey, I Blew Up the Yid: A mistake at the Israel nuclear factory turns serious. . . .

It's a Wonderful Wife: An in-depth study of the beautiful psalm, Ayshes Chayeel.

Stand By Me: Israel pleads with Diaspora Jews for more money.

Valley of the Dills: A documentary on a kosher pickle factory.

Out of Africa: The true story behind Operation Solomon and the Ethiopian Jews coming to the State of Israel.

A Fish Called Yenta: The shocking tale of a man and his carp — in the bathroom, together.

The Nine Commandments: A cheap biblical movie, made in Israel. But they ran out of money, you see. . . .

Single White Jewish Female: A tragedy. I'm too upset to even write about this one.

Allan Gould is the author of too many books, some of which even sell. How about What Did They Think of the Jews?, an anthology of 300 gentiles through history? Read a book already; forget the VCR!

Propaganda demonized Jews

The art of propaganda lies in understanding the emotional ideas of the great masses and finding... the way to the attention and thence to the heart of the broad masses. — Adolf Hitler in Mein Kampf.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Propaganda, no doubt, played an important part in mobilizing support among Germans for the Nazi party. Hitler regarded propaganda as "a vehicle of salesmanship in a mass market," writes British historian David Welch in The Third Reich: Politics and Propaganda (Routledge, Chapman & Hall, $43.95).

From the outset, the leaders of Nazi Germany sought to "re-educate" the German people. They harped on several themes: the evil of Jewry and Bolshevism, the injustice of the Treaty of Versailles and the weakness and corruption of the Weimar republic.

The day after the notorious Reichstag fire on Feb. 28, 1933, the new chancellor, Hitler, signed a decree placing restrictions on individual liberty. Less than a month later, the Jew-bating Josef Goebbels was appointed minister for popular enlightenment and propaganda. Given the Nazis' goals, it is not surprising that an entire ministry was given over to propaganda.

For Goebbels, propaganda would be an active force binding Germany together after the defeat of World War I and the chaos, economic and political, of the Weimar republic. He strongly believed that Germans needed to be mobilized on behalf of the new Germany. His ultimate aim was nothing less than the complete identification between the people and the National Socialist program of "national revolution."

Goebbels used the instruments of mass communication commonly associated with totalitarian states — radio, press and film.

Regarding radio as the "voice of the nation, Goebbels persuaded manufacturers to produce radios at affordable prices. By 1939, over 70 per cent of households owned wireless sets. Radio soon came to be regarded as the regime's principal medium for the dissemination of Nazi ideas and for the creation of a sympathetic pubic opinion. By 1935, Hitler's speeches reached an audience of some 56 million. No wonder radio was described as the "towering herald of National Socialism."

The Nazis gained control of the print media by gradually acquiring ownership of the vast majority of newspapers and magazines and by means of a state-controlled press agency. Goebbels was of the view that the press must not only inform, but also instruct.

According to Welch, the press was instrumental in the Nazis' virulent anti-Semitic campaigns. The gutter press, exemplified by Der Sturmer and Volkischer Beobachter, lashed out at Jews as subhumans. The "respectable" press was used to answer foreign criticism of Germany's racial policy and to heighten Germans' awareness of their Aryan origins and characteristics.

"Anti-Semitic propaganda became so omnipresent that in terms of everyday journalism few items or articles could be published without such a slant," writes Welch.

Film propaganda was of special interest to Goebbels, who believed that cinema would be particularly influential in swaying people's thoughts and beliefs. In 1936, the Nazi party began publishing an illustrated film magazine, Der deutsche Film, which hammered away at the theme that Jewish influence in film production should be eradicated for the good of the nation.

Far more significantly, the Nazis passed legislation forcing producers to submit treatments to Goebbels' ministry before shooting could begin. The next step was the nationalization of the film industry, which was achieved in 1942.

Unlike Hitler, Goebbels believed that propaganda was most effective when it was insidious, when its message was concealed within the framework of popular entertainment. As a result, only one-sixth of the 1,097 films made from 1933 to 1945 were overtly propagandistic with a direct political content.

The best-known films of this period were Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will and Olympia, which are recognized as masterpieces today. The most anti-Semitically repulsive movies were Der ewige Jude (The Eternal Jew) and Jud Suss.

The former likened Jews to rats and lice, and concluded that the killing of Jews was not a crime but a necessity. Not surprisingly, it was shown to concentration camp guards before a new batch of victims arrived to be exterminated. Jud Suss was more subtle, but the anti-Jewish message shone through with laser-like intensity.

Whether the medium was radio, print or film, the recurring themes in Nazi propaganda to the bitter end were four-fold: an appeal to national unity based on the principle that the community superseded the individual; the need for racial purity; a hatred of enemies, especially Jews and communists; and Hitler's charismatic leadership.

The poster for the film The Eternal Jew, a classic in Nazi propaganda.

As Welch suggests, the Nazis were obsessed with the idea of racial purity. In Mein Kampf, Hitler had laid out his philosophy. "No boy or girl," he wrote, "must leave school without having attained a clear insight into the meaning of racial purity and the importance of maintaining the racial blood unadulterated."

Only a few months after coming to power, the Nazis approved a law which permitted the compulsory sterilization of people suffering from such ailments as imbecility, schizophrenia, hereditary deafness and epilepsy, manic depression, Huntington's chorea, chronic alcoholism and extreme physical malformation.

Tens of thousands were sterilized.

On Sept. 1, 1939, the day Germany invaded Poland, Hitler issued an order to kill all persons with incurable disases. Between December 1939 and August 1941, the infamous euthanasia program claimed the lives of 72,000 persons, who perished in such deceptively-named institutions as the Charitable Foundation for the Transportation of the Sick and the Charitable Foundation for Institutional Care.

Ultimately, however, Jews were Hitler's chief targets.

Welch hastens to add that Nazi propaganda exploited the "historical predisposition" of Germans to blame Jews for Germany's ills. "Although anti-Semitism was in principle unacceptable to the churches, latent anti-Semitic prejudices shared by clergy and parishioners... continued to undermine their defence of Jews," he observes.

The Nazis launched major anti-Semitic campaigns in 1933, 1935 and 1938. The propaganda that depicted the Jew as an evil, money-grubbing communist raised little opposition in the country. Nor were serious objections raised to the Nuremberg laws, which deprived Jews of most of their civic rights. Welch says that many Germans viewed the new laws as a stabilizing and necessary measure to limit Jewish influence and to curb intermarriage.

By the late 1930s, he notes, racial propaganda had convinced the population that a so-called Jewish Question existed. Interestingly enough, Kristallnacht evoked widespread disapproval, but for the wrong reason. Most citizens seemed to object to the unchecked vandalism and wanton destruction of property.

In the final years of the regime, Welch states, the majority of Germans were bored with, or indifferent to, the Jewish Question. And these attitudes proved fatal to Jews during the Holocaust.

In assessing the overall impact of propaganda on Germany, Welch says that one of Goebbels' greatest feats was endowing Hitler with "a halo of infallibility." This was crucial for the legitimacy of the regime. Germans who may have looked askance at the Nazi party after 1933 nevertheless maintained their confidence in Hitler.

Thanks to Goebbels' propaganda, Hitler could detach himself from day-to-day politics, so that he was never personally associated with the worst extremes of the government. (In this connection, it is worthwhile remembering that Hitler did not sign a single document pertaining to the Final Solution, leaving that gruesome task to his subordinates.)

Industrial workers supported Hitler because they welcomed the restoration of full employment and social welfare schemes for the poor, while the middle-class benefited from the rearmament boom, Welch writes,

The main themes of Nazi propaganda from 1939 to 1945 revolved around the war in the West, the Russian campaign, total war and the need for strengthening morale, and promises of retaliation in response to Allied bombing of German cities.

Welch says that Hitler's standing with the public reached its apogee with the signing of the armistice with France in June 1940. After that highwater mark, enthusiasm for the war was harder to sustain.

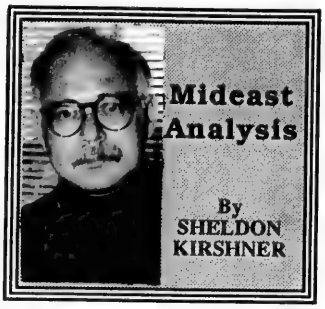
Anti-Bolshevik propaganda was ultimately unconvincing. Goebbels was unable to reconcile the regime's ideological position that the Soviet system was bankrupt with the failure of the Wehrmacht to defeat the Red Army.

During the final two years of the war, when Goebbels was Germany's principal spokesman, the effectiveness of his propaganda barrages rapidly declined. The press lost much of its credibility, while radio programs which had been popular were openly derided.

With increasing frequency, the civilian population turned to foreign broadcasts for information, despite the heavy penalties if discovered.

However, Goebbels — a fanatical Nazi — never lost his faith in propaganda.

Even as Allied armies closed in on Berlin in the spring of 1945, Goebbels diverted a huge sum of money, as well as 187,000 troops and 4,000 sailors, to make a lavish period film entitled Kolberg. By then, of course, all his exertions were an exercise in futility. Not even artful propaganda could save Nazi Germany from its miserable fate.



Dour, taciturn and soft-spoken, Haim Bar-Lev will best be remembered for his role during the War of Attrition and the Yom Kippur War.

Bar-Lev, who died in Tel Aviv on May 7, was the chief of staff from 1968 to 1971. During the War of Independence, he was a battalion commander in the Palmach. Later, he commanded the armored corps. During the Six Day War, he was Yitzhak Rabin's deputy.

Bar-Lev assumed command of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) at a time when Israel was bogged down in an escalating military struggle with its Arab adversaries, particularly Egypt. Israel had decisively defeated Egypt in 1967, but the Egyptians, with the assistance of the Soviet Union, regrouped and struck back in pinprick attacks shortly after the the Six Day War. Egypt's ultimate objective was to reconquer the Sinai Peninsula. Its immediate goal was to bleed the Israelis.

The focus of the War of Attrition was along the Suez Canal, a waterway which had been closed to shipping during the Six Day War. The Egyptians took the initiative, shelling the Israelis in artillery bombardments that claimed an increasing number of soldiers. Israel hit back, temporarily silencing Egypt.

With pressure mounting to minimize casualties, Bar-Lev had to decide how to defend the Sinai. Basically, there were two options — a defence system grounded on mobility, or one based on fixed fortifications. Bar-Lev chose the latter, which came to be known as the Bar-Lev Line.

Consisting of underground fortresses, patrol roads, berms, and tank and artillery bases, the Bar-Lev Line was designed to repel an attempt by Egypt to cross the Suez Canal and establish a bridgehead in Sinai. It was also, of course, meant to save Israeli lives.

As Chaim Herzog explains in The Arab-Israeli Wars, the Bar-Lev Line required Israel to adapt to an unaccustomed strategy of static defence in place of tactics turning on speed and manoeuvrability.

Construction began early in 1969. Until then, it was the largest engineering project ever undertaken in Israel. Work was finished on March 15 of that year, soon after a massive artillery duel that signalled a dramatic escalation in the fighting. On May 1, President Gamal Abdul Nasser of Egypt exaggeratedly announced that 60 percent of the line had been destroyed, and that the Egyptian army was making preparations to capture it.

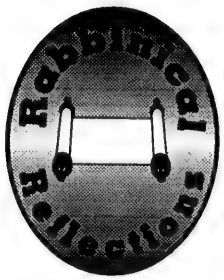
How effective was the Bar-Lev Line? There are no definitive answers. Israel's casualties rose, but they would have been far higher had the fortifications not been built. Israel kept Egypt at bay during the War of Attrition, which ended with a U.S.-sponsored ceasefire in October 1970. However, in the first days of the Yom Kippur War, Egypt breached the Bar-Lev Line and forced Israel to retreat deeper into the Sinai.

Trevor Dupuy, in Elusive Victory, writes that the line proved itself because it slowed Egypt's offensive, allowed Israel to call up reserves and enabled the IDF to stop the Egyptians' advance at the strategic Mitla Pass. A different view is expressed by Gunther Rothenburg in The Anatomy of the Israeli Army. "There seems to have been a feeling among Israeli armored commanders that it would have been far better to let the enemy cross the canal and then destroy him in a conventional enveloping attack..."

Bar-Lev's role during the 1973 war is less controversial. After leaving the IDF, he was appointed minister of trade and industry, the first of a series of cabinet posts he would hold. With the war going badly for Israel on the Golan and in Sinai, Prime Minister Golda Meir pressed him into service as a consultant.

Bar-Lev visited the Golan. By all accounts, he helped re-establish morale there, following initial victories by Syria. Next, he lent his expertise and experience to the Southern Command in the Sinai. He and others stabilized that front and then planned Israel's thrust across the canal into Egyptian territory in Africa, a move that altered the course of the war and set the stage for an eventual rapprochement between Israel and Egypt.

Bar-Lev spent his last two years as Israel's ambassador to Russia. He capped his tenure there by arranging Prime Minister Rabin's trip to Moscow last month.



By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

Tim Ward is a Torontonian who spent a number of months in a Buddhist monestary in Thailand. He writes about his adventure in a recently published book entitled What the Buddha Never Taught. It is filled with descriptions of daily life in a jungle-based community made up almost entirely of Westerners who want to experience and live a life of meditation and introspection. Ward is not Jewish and neither are any characters in the book, as far as the reader can tell. Nonetheless, it is a very Jewish book because of the insights it provides.

Life in the monastery, as Ward describes it, is informed by a series of rules, many of which seem to be arbitrary. Everything is guided by the tradition of the order, irrespective of whether the rule is encoded in the sacred texts. Even how a person is to sit or walk or bow or beg (Buddhist monks must beg for their food each morning) is determined by these rules. While Ward writes how he grew increasingly uncomfortable with the arbitrariness of the rules, he decided to persevere and remain in the monastery for the time he had stipulated. His real problem was his own spiritual quest. And for succeeding in this quest, he was willing to sacrifice reason.

Ward sought a kind of spirituality that proved elusive. His efforts at real meditation were thwarted by the grind of daily life and by the temptations he had to overcome even in the sparse and spartan environment of a jungle retreat.

Ward finally comes to realize that is is not the place that effects spiritual elevation but the person. Reclusive life in a monastery is no guarantee of nirvana, any more than a busy life in the city is any guarantee of spiritual failure. The temptations he had to transcend in the jungles were different than those he had to overcome in the city but they were temptations nonetheless. In the monastery he found that he began to lust after certain foods, even though he was eating less — or perhaps because he was eating less. Ultimately he comes to the conclusion that a person can be a spiritual being anywhere, provided that a person lives by the right code of conduct. Doing good for others is the best manifestation of doing spiritual good for oneself. And the noblest kinds of teachings are not those that are selfishly hoarded by the initiates alone, but those shared with greatest number.

In effect, Ward becomes a promoter of Judaism, even though he neither articulates nor realizes that fact. Indeed, since the times of the Pharisees, Judaism has taught that holiness can only be achieved with others and through others. Judaism tells us that our own spiritual growth is inextricably connected to our service to others.

What Ward comes to understand on his own have been the principles upon which Judaism has stood. Ward demonstrates that sometimes we need the experience of others to remind us of just how perceptive and appealing the traditions of Judaism really are.

Chabad to evacuate 1,001st child

KFAR CHABAD — June 5 will be a day for rejoicing and celebration, when the thousand and first child to be evacuated from the nuclear disaster zone around Chernobyl lands at Israel's Ben Gurion Airport under the auspices of the Chabad Children of Chernobyl Project.

World acclaimed producer/director Steven Spielberg and other celebrities will be featured at the arrival ceremony, which will be broadcast via satellite around the world at 6:40 p.m. Israel time.

Although the Chernobyl reactor exploded eight years ago, the danger to children in the region persists. Living in contaminated areas, they continue to ingest radiation through their food and water. Medical care is either non-existent or substandard. The young survivors must be removed permanently from the region to receive proper nutrition and medical treatment. The need for evacuation is urgent.

As part of a project spearheaded by the Chabad Youth Organization of Israel and supported by generous Jews everywhere, a total of 10 flights and 950 Jewish children have already been brought to Israel from Ukraine and Belarus since 1990. The children come without their parents to Kfar Chabad where they are given medical treatment, room and board, and schooling.

Over 200 "Chernobyl children" gathered in Jerusalem recently to celebrate the airlift of the 1,001st child from Ukraine. [IPPA photo]

"The number of 1,001 is symbolic," said Yossie Raichik, director of the Chabad Children of Chernobyl Project. "It represents the achievement of having already saved 1,000 children from the ravages of Chernobyl. More important, it represents the first of the next thousand children we intend to bring here in the near future."

More than 2,000 children are on a waiting list for evacuation.

This relief effort is the world's largest and the only one to permanently remove Chernobyl victims from the deadly environment in which they now live.

Peel board delays school year

TORONTO — The Peel Board of Education last week voted overwhelmingly to delay the start of the next academic year in order to accommodate Rosh Hashanah.

The board voted 18-0, with one abstention, to delay the beginning of the 1994-95 school year to Sept. 8 so Jewish students and staff would not have to miss the key first two days of classes.

Rosh Hashanah will fall on Sept 6. and 7. The school year was to have begun on the sixth.

The Peel board listened to pleas from Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, as well as Rabbi Lawrence Englander and education director Arlene Botnick, both of Solel Congregation in Mississauga.

Also present was Rabbi Ed Lander of Har Tikva Congregation in Brampton.

Trustees also considered a report from staff, urging the board to delay the school year start.

The vote was the strongest support to date from a school board for the campaign to delay the coming school year start.

With one exception, all Metro Toronto-area school board have voted to begin the school year on Sept. 8 to accommodate Jewish students and staff. Only the Scarborough Board of Education has refused, and classes there will start Sept. 6.

Many urban school boards across Canada have also voted to begin classes Sept. 8.

Jewish groups have argued that the coincidence of the Jewish new year and the first days of classes is virtually a once-in-a-lifetime occurrence.

Lou Lenkinski of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region praised the Peel decision as a progessive sign of how minorities are being treated in Canada.

Baycrest wins lifestyle award

TORONTO — Clients, staff and visitors from the community eat the better way at Baycrest Centre, which was recently presented with two Lifestyle Approved awards from the City of North York.

The awards are a recognition by the city's Public Health Department and the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario of food facilities which support a healthy lifestyle. Restaurants and food services can play an important role in combatting the number one killer of Canadians — cardiovascular disease, which is preventable in many cases by a healthy diet.

The recipients of the awards were the Baycrest cafeteria (Food and Nutrition Services) and the WA Cafe, operated by the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary. To qualify as winners, they were expected to meet standards set in four areas: nutrition, sanitation, provision of non-smoking areas and signage, and accessibility for the disabled.

The City of North York expects that the Lifestyle Approved awards will become an annual event, with participants being evaluated on a yearly basis. As winners this year, Baycrest's cafeteria and WA cafe will be promoted within the community as a "Lifestyle Approved" facility.

Rabbi Allen named head of rabbis group

TORONTO — Ridding the community of so-called "entrepreneurial" rabbis — uncredentialed people who prey on the less-informed with "quickie" conversions and other services — is a priority for Rabbi Wayne Allen, newly-elected president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR).

Rabbi Allen succeeds Rabbi Dow Marmur as head of the TBR, the city's umbrella group for Reform, Reconstructionist and Conservative rabbis.

Rabbi Marmur has stepped down after a two-year term.

Rabbi Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Willowdale, says he's hopeful that ways can be found to stamp out what he calls "entrepreneurial rabbis who prey on the ignorant members of the Jewish community.

"More and more complaints have been received from unaffiliated Jews who have paid large sums of money for dubious services provided poorly or not at all," Rabbi Allen says.

"One of the major tasks ahead is to find effective ways of alerting the public and encouraging them to consult only with properly credentialed rabbis."

Rabbi Allen, a 43-year-old graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary, served pulpits in Staten Island, N.Y., and Lakewood, Calif., before coming to Toronto seven years ago.

He received smichah (rabbinic ordination) in 1977.

He has served the TBR as recording secretary, treasurer and vice-president. He was responsible for drafting the group's current constitution and for introducing the practice of collecting money for Mazon Canada at every meeting at which food is served.

In 1992, Rabbi Allen resigned from the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), the umbrella for North American Conservative rabbis, and as chair of the RA's Ontario wing, because of his dissatisfaction with the movement's direction.

He's currently treasurer of the U.S.-based Union for Traditional Judaism,

Rabbi Wayne Allen

founded a decade ago to bring more tradition to non-Orthodox Judaism.

Continuing the work of his predecessor at the TBR won't be easy, he says, but he's up to the challenge.

"The TBR can be seen as a microcosm of what the Jewish community can be. Almost 40 rabbis from different backgrounds and with different viewpoints come together, putting their differences aside for the greater good of all Jews," he says.

Rabbi Allen's other plans include expanding cooperation with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and other communal agencies.

He believes that "rabbis, because of their experience and training, have a valuable perspective that needs to be heard in the highest echelons of decision making."

Joining Rabbi Allen on the TBR's executive are Rabbi Michael Stroh, vice-president; Rabbi Sheldon Korn, recording secretary; Rabbi Yitzchak Witty, corresponding secretary; and Rabbi Philip Scheim, treasurer.

Hebrew school to open in Richmond Hill

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —As teacher Lillian Benlolo lit the Shabbat candles her first Friday night in her new home in the wilds of Richmond Hill, she felt as if she and her family were the only Jews around.

Then she looked outside her living room window — and saw that the neighbors across the street were also lighting Shabbat candles.

This was a sign, she says, that Jewish life can flourish outside of the main centres. And she plans to encourage this trend as much as she can.

Over the years, she taught at various Jewish afternoon schools, started Heritage programs for York Region, graduated from the Midrasha (Jewish Teachers' Seminary) and spent three months in Israel taking special courses from the Israel Ministry of Education in the latest educational methods.

And now she is ready for the next step — starting a non-denominational school in Richmond Hill, which will be called Beth Israel Hebrew Academy.

The private, for profit school will meet twice a week for two hours at a time, in the Yonge and Elgin Mills area.

Prayers, Hebrew language, holidays, love of Israel, Jewish history, music and dance will form a well-rounded curriculum, she plans, "in a joyful environment.

The school is not eligible to apply for BJE affiliation until it has been open for a year.

Videos, computers, trips, pen pal relationships with children in Israel will make the school experience even more enjoyable, Benlolo says.

She has developed a method of teaching the Hebrew alphabet that she says enables children to learn to read and write Hebrew much faster. Five consecutive booklets include reading drill, writing and short stories.

"The students are happy, because they finish each one quickly and go on to the next one. In a few months they will have learned to read and write Hebrew."

Each class will have a teacher and an assistant, and there will be different teachers for each subject.

Each student, Benlolo says, will have his or her own file, so that their progress can be followed efficiently and effectively until they graduate.

So far, she says, the response to the new school, which she hopes to open in September, has been excellent.

"I would like to have from 45 to 60 students in the school, so that I can get to know each child."

Benlolo, who has three children of her own, says she thinks a Hebrew school in Richmond Hill will bring the scattered community closer together.

"I want it to be like a Jewish centre, where Jewish kids can make friends."

While she says she recognizes that the afternoon school cannot compare to a day school, there are many reasons why parents do not send their children there, including, for Richmond Hill Jews, the distance.

"If I can save one soul, why not? There is too much assimilation — if I can put inside little hearts a love and respect for Judaism, Israel and for other Jews, I am accomplishing something important."

For more information, or to register for Beth Israel Hebrew Academy, call Benlolo, at (905)770-1082.

Interaction reaches out to young adults

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After graduating last year as a biology major from the University of Waterloo, Melyssa Aronson returned to her hometown of Toronto, only to find herself feeling somewhat estranged from the Jewish community.

"I wanted to get involved, but I didn't know how," says the 23-year-old, who found a temporary job at the Jewish Community Centre. "It seemed that there was nothing in Toronto's Jewish community for someone my age to get involved with, except singles groups, which weren't for me because I was engaged."

Aronson's fiancee, Michael Goldenberg, also felt Toronto's Jewish community offered little for people in their 20s.

"People aren't comfortable with the singles 'meat-market' atmosphere," says the 26-year-old graduate of Ryerson's business program. "We felt it was important to get people together socially in a friendly way, not in a singles atmosphere that seems uncomfortable and contrived."

Goldenberg, Aronson and six friends have established an organization, Interaction, to fill that need. Interaction welcomes returning students to Toronto, sponsors social events for "twenty-somethings" whether single or married, provides advice on employment issues and, not incidentally, strengthens young peoples' Jewish identities.

"We want to reach out and welcome anyone in our age group, make sure they're set up for all the holidays, and just get them in touch with the Jewish community of Toronto," Aronson says.

The group's first function was a pot-luck house party for about 35 people, mostly friends of the organization's eight board members. "It went pretty well," says Corey Goldman, who recently attained a degree in history from York University. "Everyone seemed pretty enthusiastic that we were starting this organization."

The board members polled attendees to determine what sort of organization could serve them best. "It's an organization started by people our age so we know what we need and we know what we want," Aronson says.

Interaction board members have sent letters to universities and synagogues across Canada. They installed a phone line which receives about 10 calls daily. They have also contacted various offices within the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to ensure maximum community cooperation and avoid duplication of services.

Interaction plans to host a wine and cheese reception at the University Women's Club, St. George and Bloor streets, on Sunday June 19 from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. As well, it is planning an "Israeli night" and a weekend getaway to Maple Lake in the fall.

For further information, call Interaction at (416) 754-5512.

Baycrest's Spring Sale a success

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre's third annual Spring Sale was held on April 21 in the attractive atrium and main floor area of Baycrest Hospital. The event drew an estimated 6,000 eager shoppers and raised more than $100,000 for the centre, up 35 per cent from last year.

The sale, a major fundraiser for the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary, was entirely organized by WA volunteers, with much support from Baycrest staff.

This year the merchandise was presented somewhat differently, with shoppers able to browse through various "stores," including a Drug Mart, Collectibles, Fashion Centre, Food Mart and Silent Auction. All goods (except collectibles) were new and reduced in price by at least 50 per cent.

WA volunteers start months in advance to solicit individuals and businesses for contributions to the sale.

"We were extremely lucky this year to receive a very generous donation from Shoppers Drug Mart," says Women's Auxiliary President Tobie Bekhor. "They and their suppliers donated goods from their annual show, so that we had an excellent selection of drug products, candies and sundries."

The Silent Auction which raised $30,000 was a definite hit, particularly club seats to Blue Jays games which went at prices far above value.

Bekhor credits the increased attendance at the Spring Sale to the bargains available and to word-of-mouth promotion.

"We've doubled our sales over the first year, mainly due to community awareness and neighborhood support," she says.

Also instrumental to the day's success was the support of dozens of WA volunteers. Says Mimi Greenspoon, vice-president/coordinator of the event: "More than 260 people worked on the sale this year. They were supervised by a group of dedicated chairpersons

We promised to offer the biggest one-day sale on Bathurst Street and we did it!"

All proceeds from the Baycrest Spring Sale support the annual Women's Auxiliary Alzheimer's Research Fellowship, the first funded post-doctoral fellowship established at the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre.

Researcher traces early Jewish peddlers

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not all the Jewish peddlers in Toronto who sold their wares between 1890 and 1910 went on to become rich merchant princes, and not all were rugged individualists.

These stereotypes are shattered in an article by Deena Nathanson in Canadian Jewish Studies (CJS), a new journal, sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Historical Society.

Edited by Professor Richard Menkis of Vancouver, it has a striking photograph of a menorah at Yellowknife, sculpted from ice, on its cover, an Inuk standing by.

The CJS will be launched at special events in Calgary, Vancouver and Montreal, while the Toronto launch will coincide with the Jewish Book Awards, June 15, at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

The early peddlers of Toronto may have owed as much to the strong network of family relatives, landsmanschaften, synagogues and benevolent societies as they did to their own hard work, Nathanson, a PhD candidate in history at the University of Toronto, suggests.

She also found it surprising that some left peddling to take full-time jobs as travellers or in garment factories, thus losing the coveted social position of being in business for yourself.

She studied 72 peddlers, drawn from a larger group, whom she was able to trace form 1890 to 1930 through Might Directories, synagogue and society records.

Among those she mentioned were Joseph Greisman, Moses Brody, Chaim Bochner, Michael Stone, Julius Brown, Samuel Ginsberg, Chaim Wilder, Mendel Granatstein, Henry Greisman, one of the five most successful of the 72, Abraham and Max Cohen, Samuel Shapiro, Samuel Greenbaum, Morris Steinberg, Louis and Harry Rotenberg, Isaac and Barnett Cooper, Louis Levinsky and Solomon Rapp.

Some of the immigrants studied did not succeed as entrepreneurs, Nathanson writes, and so abandoned the trade for safer jobs. "None attained the folkloric dimensions of those North American heroes named Gimbel and Macy."

Nevertheless Granastein donated substantial sums to Goel Tzedek Congregation of which 27 of the 72 families studied were members. Greisman owned a number of properties on Chestnut Street and with Louis and Harry Rotenberg established the Empire Suspender Company.

Naim Kattan

Although some of the peddlers became active in the Farband Labor Zionist Organization or other organizations identified with the working class, Nathanson writes that the Toronto Hebrew Peddler's Protective Association had an aversion to the goals of organized labor.

CJS inherits the colorful tradition and solid academic achievments of the affiliated groups of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society. One need only glance at the program of its June 12-13 annual meeting at the University of Calgary to realize how relevant is the CJHS, now headed by famed Quebec writer Naim Kattan.

The first volume of CJS appears at an "exciting but fragile moment in the history of the Canadian Jewish experience," writes editor Menkis in a foreword.

The pages of volume one of the CJS, replete with references to books and articles by such stalwart chroniclers of the western Jewish scene as Abraham J. Arnold and Harry Gutkin and the Maritime historian, Marcia Koven, should inspire current university students to dig deeper into the rich history of Canadian Jews.

Members of the editorial board, along with Menkis, are Irving M. Abella, Pierre Anctil, Paula J. Draper and Kattan. For information, write to the editor, Department of Religious Studies, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, Canada, V6T 1Z1.

Lizzies' annual dinner to honor 1944 champs

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was Passover 1944 and the Lizzies Red Devils had just dispatched the Montreal YMHA on their home turf to qualify for the Juvenile Dominion Basketball Championship.

With the title match in Saint John, N.B., the boys from the Elizabeth Playground loaded up with kosher food and boarded a train for the day-long ride.

Playing in championship matches was nothing new for Lizzies athletes, but this event was a little different. Following the win in Montreal, two members of the team pulled out of the championship so they could spend the holiday with their families.

The depleted contingent continued on to the Maritimes where they were greeted by members of the Saint John Jewish community who had been alerted to their arrival by Canadian Jewish Congress.

Instead of spending a lonely Passover on the road, they were billetted with local families and they enjoyed the home-cooked meals and haymische atmosphere offered by their hosts. Buoyed by their comfortable surroundings, the Lizzies came up big in the two-game total point national championship, winning the first game 54-27 and following that up with a 42-25 win for a combined 96-52 margin.

That championship team will be feted on Wednesday, June 8 at the Bob Abate Centre, 485 Montrose Ave. near Christie Pits. Nine out of the team's 10 players and one of the team's coaches will be on hand for the festivities, according to Mort Greenberg, a Lizzies alumnus who's publicizing the event.

Bob Abate, the team's head coach and inspirational leader, died in 1981 at age 87, but his memory is carried on in the recreational centre that bears his name.

A member of the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame who was inducted for his success as a coach of basketball, hardball and softball teams, Abate was the originator of the Lizzies. The team takes its name from its first home at the Elizabeth Street playground where the Hospital for Sick Children now stands.

When the playground disappeared, the team became the wandering Jews of the teenage sporting world. The mostly Jewish athletes played out of a variety of playgrounds and schools in the downtown core area, including Jarvis Collegiate, Central Commerce and College United Church.

Softball was played at Central Tech and hardball at Christie Pits, recalls Norm Cornack, a Lizzies alumnus.

The Lizzies had become so accomplished that on one occasion tournament organizers, jealous of their success, scheduled Ontario championship matches in softball and hardball on the same day in 1946 in different cities. Faced with that difficult situation, Abate divided the team into two squads and miraculously, the split teams both won championships. In fact, it was the third championship in three years — in both sports — for the Red Devils, Greenberg said.

Abate was "able to get the very best out of the players," Cornack recalls. "We would have walked on Lake Ontario or run through a brick wall for him."

Abate set a good example for the young men under his care, he continued. He didn't smoke, drink or cuss. He was unswervingly loyal, "sticking by his players."

Proceeds from the 50th anniversary dinner will benefit the Bob Abate Centre and a number of children's charities, including the Children's Wish Foundation, Special Olympics, Variety Village, Toronto Star Christmas Box Fund and the Kids' Foundation.

Organizers expect to raise up to $10,000 this year, Greenberg said.

For more information, contact Harvey Bronstine at (905) 886-6580 or Norm Cornack at (416) 749-6735.

Former students of Rabbi Price pay tribute to mentor's memory

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A brilliant, creative thinker, a scholar and successful businessman, totally committed to maintaining Halachah yet surprisingly open-minded, noted for being brusque, yet endlessly supportive of his students — this was the picture of Rabbi Abraham Price that emerged at a recent memorial service.

Rabbi Price died in Toronto during Pesach. The memorial service for his students was organized by Rabbi Erwin Schild, himself a former student, and was held at Adath Israel Congregation.

Rabbi Price, Rabbi Schild said, saw it as his duty "to continue on these shores the same traditions of piety" as had existed in Europe before Hitler.

Rabbi Schild remembered when, as a young student, interned as an enemy alien by an unsympathetic Canadian government, Rabbi Price, "still a young man, energetic, handsome," came to the internment camp to meet the yeshivah students who were there.

"He promised to do his best to take us out of the camp," Rabbi Schild said, adding that, with the help of Senator Arthur Roebuck, a friend, he got access to deputy immigration minister F.C. Blair (of "none is too many" infamy) and persuaded him it was his God-given duty to rebuild the scholarly community in Canada.

"He told Blair 'you can have my head if any of these boys is a Nazi spy' ".

At a time when the Jewish community was ambivalent about the internees, feeling insecure, Rabbi Schild said, about their own position in Canada, and seeing yeshivah students as being at the bottom of the economic ladder, Rabbi Price appeared at a meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress and persuaded them to assist the students financially — sending then-president Sam Bronfman into inarticulate rage in the process.

"He was authoritarian," said Rabbi Schild, never willing to abide by the decisions of others, and as a result was never a political success in the community, even the Orthodox.

"But he was like a father to us — he looked after our welfare, food, clothing, and gave us the opportunity to make a living in whatever field we chose."

While he tolerated no short cuts in religious observance, "he wanted to make observance possible — he didn't look for chumrahs (technical stringencies). He believed in keeping Torah in the proper way, but without exaggeration or ostentatious piety."

Rabbi Erwin Schild

Larry Sonenberg, president of Adath Israel, noted that Rabbi Price had taught the first rabbi of Adath Israel, Rabbi Avraham Kelman, as well as Rabbi Schild, now rabbi emeritus, and the late Rabbi Albert Pappenheim of Beth David Synagogue. "Fifty years of rabbinate in Toronto is due to Rabbi Price."

Rabbi Steven Saltzman, spiritual leader of Adath Israel, said that Rabbi Price's gift was to be able to "hear the inner voices of the Torah, and transmit them to his students and to the present day."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation, also a former student, called him "a creator of institutions. He believed that Toronto too could be a place of Torah," and he worked to ensure that it was.

Rabbi Schild led more than 20 former students of Rabbi Price in the Kaddish.

Ben Kayfetz, former executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Central region, described Toronto when Rabbi Price arrived in the late 1930s as a place in the grip of the Great Depression, but full of hope and good intentions.

It was an immigrant community, where the observant were outnumbered by the indifferent, where kashruth was observed, but Shabbat was not, where yeshivot were thought to be possible only in New York, where ethnic divisions held sway.

It was a world of fierce union activity and philosophical sectarianism, of the Yiddishe Journale, and of landsmanschaften.

In his closing remarks, Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, said that the greatest praise of a teacher is that he had praiseworthy students, a legacy Rabbi Price had indeed created.

Change in program

TORONTO — Daphna Golan, a leading civil and women's rights advocate in Israel, will replace Meretz MK Naomi Chazan in Sisters and Strangers: A Jewish-Arab Women's Dialogue, due to changes in Chazan's schedule.

The speaking tour, sponsored by the New Israel Fund, also features Mariam Mari'i, founder and president of the Acre Arab Women's Association. The two women will be in Toronto on June 12 for an afternoon lecture at OISE moderated by writer Michele Landsberg as well as an evening lecture at Temple Sinai moderated by lawyer Linda Silver-Dranoff and introduced by Ontario premier Bob Rae. The afternoon lecture will focus on women's issues, and the evening lecture will encompass peace, co-existence and women's rights.

Golan works with women in East and West Jerusalem in her role as director of Bat Shalom, the Jerusalem Centre for Women's Action. She is also a member of the directing committee of the Human Rights Centre at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where she lectures in African Studies.

For further information about the lectures or to reserve tickets, call the New Israel Fund of Canada office at 340-0507.

Support for abused

can only be lifted by placing it where it belongs — on the abuser, and for this we need a lot of community support."

Fassel said that slowly, as a result of lobbying, the law is acknowledging the right of women to seek redress for assault by anyone, including husbands, doctors, clergy or parents. "The government introduced legislation which has become law, that describes protocol for health professionals. Under Bill 100, Ontario residents can now bring action against those who abuse them."

She admitted, however, that what happens to women in a sexual assault trial is "inexcusable. The cruelty and abuse has been construed as a penalty for women who dare to speak out."

Hampson set to talk at breast cancer forum

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Sharon Hampson

TORONTO — Sharon Hampson wants people to know that there is life after breast cancer. For the past six years, her own life has proved the point.

"I'm well. I'm happy. I'm effective. I work," noted the popular children's entertainer in a recent phone interview. Hampson, 51, best known as one-third of Sharon, Lois and Bram, was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1988 and underwent a lumpectomy. A recurrence in February 1993 necessitated a second lumpectomy, a course of radiation and treatment with tamoxifen pills.

Hampson will be the keynote speaker at Breast Cancer — The Up Side, an information evening co-sponsored by Toronto Hadassah-WIZO and the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation. The program will be held on June 9 at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Other panelists will be radiation oncologist Dr. Roy Clark, plastic reconstructive surgeon Dr. John Semple, and research dietician Mary Cousins. A question-and-answer period will follow each speaker.

Hampson first went public with her story last November, when she addressed the National Forum on Breast Cancer in Montreal at the invitation of Clark, who was her radiation oncologist.

"I couldn't imagine why telling my story would be an important thing to do," Hampson says. "There's nothing particularly remarkable about it. There are women who've been through far worse."

Yet her speech last November touched a deep chord in her audience. One doctor told her, "I will teach differently because of you," she recalls.

"If telling my story helps some doctors have more empathy for the patients, then I understand I have done something good," she says. "If my experience reflects the feelings of other women, then there's some value in speaking publicly about them."

Hampson's experience as a breast cancer survivor has also led to her involvement on a number of committees working to meet the needs of women who have breast cancer.

Hampson feels that it's important for such committees to include breast cancer survivors. She explains that the perspective offered by women who have been patients complements the clinical expertise offered by medical professionals.

Women need better ways of accessing information about breast cancer, Hampson noted. One of the ways she is addressing that issue is by working with others on a proposal for a Toronto-based Ontario support and resource centre, a project sponsored by Burlington Breast Cancer Support Services.

Although breast cancer is the leading killer of women between the ages of 35 and 55, according to statistics from the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, it has one of the best survival rates compared to other types of cancer.

"Take care of yourself," Hampson advises other women. "It's possible to have breast cancer and have a life after, but not if you find a lump and don't go to a doctor. Then you really undermine your own future.

"What worked for me was learning as much as I could about the treatment options and being a participant in decisions."

For further information about the panel discussion or to purchase tickets in advance, call Toronto Hadassah-WIZO at 789-4373.

Artist donates oil painting

TORONTO — Heddy Kun, noted Israeli artist, is donating her newest oil painting to Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, Jerusalem.

Mrs. Kun incorporated an artist's vision of the Jerusalem hills in her landscape painting, which will be placed in the Medical Centre's Hedi Steinberg auditorium, used for national and international medical conferences. The painting will be unveiled in May during the dedication of the hospital's Comprehensive Heart Institute.

Born in Zagreb at the start of World War II, the artist was raised by her grandparents in Budapest after her parents perished in the Holocaust and graduated from the Budapest Academy of Art. She emigrated to Israel in 1956.

Heddy Kun

Known for her sense of color, Mrs. Kun has had one-artist shows in galleries across Israel, as well as in North America, Europe and Australia. She was featured in the recent Shaare Zedek Foundation art exhibit and sale in Toronto.

A limited number of seriagraphs have been pulled from her painting, with a percentage of the proceeds of their sale to be donated to the Shaare Zedek Comprehensive Heart Institute.

For information, please call 781-3584 in Toronto or 1-800-387-3595 across Canada.

Hadassah-WIZO to fete Adelmans in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A special tribute to Tishelle and Murray Adelman will be a highlight of Hamilton Hadassah-WIZO's closing function on Monday, June 13, 7.30 p.m. at Temple Anshe Sholom.

In addition, Vice-President Lila Strub, one of nine women from across Canada to attend the recent international Aviv seminar in Israel, will report on her trip, and outgoing council president, Linda Waxman, will be succeeded by the first of several past presidents, who will take turns acting as president over the coming year.

Entertainment will be provided by Ruth Slater, cantor of Temple Anshe Sholom, accompanied by Tom Shilcock.

The Adelmans are being honored for their years of dedication and service to Hadassah-WIZO.

Indeed, "Hadassah-WIZO has been part of my life for over 40 years," Tishelle told The CJN.

A former Torontonian, she joined the organization when she moved to Hamilton following her marriage. While living in Chatham for a few years in the '60s, she served as president of Frances Geller chapter, and on her return to Hamilton, as president of Chai chapter.

Since then Tishelle has been council president, regional chair and a member of the national executive for about 15 years. She has co-convened the bazaar, the Youth Aliyah campaign and telethon and the Hamilton Jewish community telephone directory.

She has also served as president of Temple Anshe Sholom Sisterhood, as a volunteer at Joseph Brant Hospital and as a canvasser for UJA, the Cancer Society, the Heart and Stroke Foundation and the Kidney Foundation.

Murray meanwhile, though he jokes "I always walked three steps behind my wife, that's why I was always called her back-up!" has an impressive list of volunteer activities of his own.

Besides assisting his wife with her Hadassah duties "in any way I could," — shlepping, collecting, driving, — he's also Hamilton Hadassah-WIZO's Male Life Association chair and responsible for recruiting some 15 to 20 men.

In Chatham, Murray served as president of the local B'nai Brith lodge, Israel Bonds chair and program chair for the United Way. In Hamilton, he was treasurer and vice-president of Temple Anshe Sholom.

He has acted as an advisor for Hamilton Jewish Social Services sheltered workshop; as a canvasser for UJA, CNIB, the Hamilton Philharmonic Orchestra and Liberty House; as a volunteer for the Hamilton Association for Community Living and the Distress Centre. He has served on the board of the Hamilton Junior Chamber of Commerce.

The Adelmans have three children, Ellen Faith, married in Los Angeles and a mother of seven; Evan, who works at Yuk Yuk's in Toronto, and Warren, public affairs chief with the Israeli embassy in Washington, married and awaiting the birth of his first child in August.

Olim co-ordinate Jerusalem work/study

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When former Torontonians Leah and Stephen Shmuel Bowman made aliyah last August, they dreamed of some day providing a program for North Americans visiting Israel.

The young couple will be realizing their dream this month when they take on the role of program coordinators for Livnot Ulehibanot's Jerusalem campus. The non-profit organization, whose name means To Build and To Be Built, runs three-month and three-week work-study programs for English-speaking young Jewish adults age 21 to 30, who have minimal Jewish background.

The program was started in 1980 in Safed by American olim Aharon and Miriam Botzer. The Jerusalem campus was opened last year.

When the Bowmans settled in Jerusalem last year, about a 10-minute walk from the Livnot building, they were curious about the program and offered to host participants for a Friday-night dinner.

They liked what they discovered about the program: morning work sessions are dedicated to the "Livnot" aspect, with projects such as building playgrounds or painting apartments for new olim. Afternoon classes cover subjects such as National Security, Current Events, Torah Text, and Jewish Ethics and philosophy.

Scenic hikes are an integral part of the program, as are shared (kosher) meal preparation and traditional celebration of Shabbat. Shabbat at Livnot alternates with home hospitality and free Shabbatot when participants may travel or visit friends and relatives in Israel.

Leah, 23, and Stephen, 31, will live on-site. "This whole experience is not the sort of thing you turn on at 9 in the morning and turn off at 4 p.m.," said Stephen. Part of their job will be to answer questions and put the multitude of new experiences into context for the participants, he explained. "We're kind of like the mom and dad of the place."

Their enthusiasm for the program and for life in Jerusalem is abundant. The Jerusalem sunsets, said Leah, are "breathtaking." Stephen is taken with the "cultural, historical and archeological richness" of the city, although he notes wryly that olim "need a sense of humor" in their frequent dealings with Israeli bureaucracy.

The Bowmans credit the Israel Aliyah Centre and Ofer Gavish, Toronto's aliyah shaliach at the time they were preparing to leave, with helping to ease their transition by providing practical information concerning their move.

Stephen spent four months in ulpan upon arriving in Israel, to perfect the Hebrew he had learned at United Synagogue Day School and later at Beth Tikvah Hebrew High School. A former camper and counsellor at Camp Ramah, Stephen has a BA in Jewish Studies as well as a master's degree in gerontology. He worked in seniors community liaison for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind before making aliyah.

Leah, a native of Detroit, graduated from the University of Michigan in 1992 with a degree in English. She served as editor of Prospect, the university's Jewish student journal, for two years.

After making aliyah and attending ulpan, she worked in publishing at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, while Stephen worked for an organization providing home care to seniors.

They met, appropriately enough, in Israel, when they participated in a conference for young Jewish adults called Kesher in December 1991, and they married in September 1992.

"We thought it would be very fulfilling to work with North Americans," recalls Stephen now. "This was the type of thing we wanted to do."

A refreshing alternative to where you are banking now
... has arrived in North York

Municipal Trust has been offering mortgages and GICs at 343 Wilson Avenue (just west of Bathurst) for some time. And now our customers are asking us to provide a full range of financial services, including investment/chequing and savings accounts.

That's exactly what we've been doing successfully in 28 branches throughout the heartland of Ontario — offering a "main street" alternative to banking services. So we decided to bring our heartland approach to North York with our new full-service branch at 343 Wilson Avenue.

One of Canada's top five independent trust companies

Our hometown values are backed by major league stability. We have assets in excess of $1 billion, the status as one of Canada's top five independent trust companies and a steadfast commitment to superlative performance.

Meet Maura De Luca

Drop in and meet Branch Manager Maura De Luca. Enjoy a coffee while she tells you about our service hallmark: The Municipal Trust $5 Guarantee. You'll see why customers from Ontario's heartland communities know us as "the hometown alternative to big city banks".

Looking for a fresh alternative?

Look no further than Wilson & Bathurst. After all, we may be taking Municipal Trust out of the heartland, but we promise never to take the heartland out of Municipal Trust.

You could win a fabulous "heartland" vacation*

Imagine a fabulous 7 day vacation for 4 to Deerhurst Resort in Huntsville (approximate value $5,000). Right in the midst of Ontario's heartland country of sparkling lakes and majestic trees... it's an all-inclusive, activity-packed vacation of a lifetime that could be yours.

Drop by the branch soon for all the exciting details on how easy it is to enter our Vacation to the Heartland contest.

Jerusalem Foundation plans amphitheatre in Hinnom Valley

TORONTO — More than 200 people attended a reception in honor of the former mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, founder of the Jerusalem Foundation, which serves the needs of Christians, Muslims and Jews in Jerusalem.

A number of well-known politicians, clergy, community leaders and Jerusalem Foundation supporters attended the reception at the Timothy Eaton Memorial Church, hosted by Senior Minister Rev. Dr. Douglas Lobb.

Kollek, international president of the Jerusalem Foundation, established the organization more than 25 years ago when he realized that Jerusalem was a poor city that required rebuilding after decades of neglect and desecration by wars.

The Foundation, which is a voluntary organization, earmarks donations for specific projects. Now in 10 countries, the Foundation has created parks, playgrounds and museums, and renovated many buildings in all parts of Jerusalem. It has filled the needs of numerous social services providing seniors' facilities, nurseries, schools, and a home for battered women, often in cooperation with local municipalities.

The Canadian branch of the Jerusalem Foundation has been under the custodianship of Montreal's Charles Bronfman and national president Manuel Batshaw. Recently, a Toronto office was opened headed by Paul Slavens.

At the reception, Canadian architect, Jack Diamond, internationally acclaimed for many projects including Jerusalem's new civic centre and the Supreme Court complex, announced that the Toronto board has selected as its first project, a stage in a natural amphitheatre in the Hinnom Valley which is situated between eastern and western Jerusalem, between Jewish and Arab communities.

Diamond explained that the natural amphitheatre, which will cost $100,000 (US) to build, will be part of the Jerusalem Youth Music Centre, a project that serves more than 400 Jewish, Christian and Arab young people. The new stage and equipment at the amphitheatre will house a youth music ensemble of 25 Jewish and 30 Arab children. The ensemble recently played at a reception for the King and Queen of Spain. Other cultural and arts activities will also be held at the amphitheatre.

"The permanent stone structure in the amphitheatre will contribute greatly towards the future goodwill between Jews and Arabs, and the future peace in Jerusalem," says Diamond.

Toronto Mayor June Rowlands, who recently returned from an international meeting of mayors in Jerusalem said, "Jerusalem belongs to the world."

Ontario Premier Bob Rae spoke of his recent visit to Israel. He commended the Jerusalem Foundation for its outstanding and diversified programs.

Earlier in the day, Conrad Black, recently appointed to the board of the Jerusalem Foundation, and his wife Barbara Amiel Black, hosted a luncheon for the Foundation in honor of Kollek.

Keren Hayesod leader visits Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — For many Jews around the world, Keren Hayesod United Israel Appeal (UIA) is "the only connection to Judaism and Torah and Yiddishkeit." Without this connection, Rabbi Adi Sultanik told members and guests at a Jewish Federation board meeting here, "Jewish continuity in the Diaspora would suffer on many levels."

However, added the director of the Keren Hayesod Rabbinic Forum, "This is untrue of Canada because you have a tremendously successful system of Jewish education."

Accompanied by UJA national field director Barney Harris, Rabbi Sultanik was paying a brief visit to Hamilton during his recent tour of North American communities.

He made a point of stressing the importance of the funds raised by the UIA in ensuring Jewish continuity in both the Diaspora and Israel, and the need to maintain the connection between the two — the Diaspora and Israel — through UIA.

Many people don't realize, said Rabbi Sultanik, how much of the money raised for Israel comes back in such forms as shlichim (emissaries), educational programming, teachers and "the Israeli experience," which provides a year of study in Israel for students.

UIA provides the money for these programs, from which, he said, students "come back to ensure Jewish continuity."

Following Rabbi Sultanik's address, the board meeting proceeded with its usual agenda, chaired by president David Steinberg, but in an unusual location, at the old Hess Street Shul.

Because board members are responsible for setting policy, it seems a good idea, explained executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel, to take board meetings out into the community once in a while.

"It takes the monotony out of board meetings. While we can't change the agenda," she said, "we can change the location."

And besides, she continued, "it adds a little sparkle to the meetings."

The plan is to hold board meetings at the various synagogues, Shalom Village and Jewish Social Services and to invite members of the community at large.

Russian institute explores Jewish past

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — An institute in the Russian city of St. Petersburg has organized some 30 scientific expeditions to former Jewish villages within the old Pale of Settlement, in search of documents and monuments pertaining to Jewish culture and history.

So far, nearly 700 towns and shtetls and more than 100 Jewish cemeteries have been studied, says Dr. Valery Aronovich Dymshits, director of the Institute for the Investigation of the Jewish Diaspora, which is connected to St. Petersburg Jewish University.

Expedition members have conducted oral history interviews with Jews still living in Ukraine, Belarus, Moldova, Georgia, Lithuania and other territories, says Dymshits, who was a featured speaker at the recent International Seminar on Jewish Genealogy in Jerusalem. As part of the project, the group is working on an index of Jewish sites, using file materials from various archives throughout the former Soviet Union, including areas of Central Asia where Jews once resided.

So far, the group has found about 40 synagogues, some dating from the 16th century, including a wooden baroque synagogue dating from the 18th century and four other wooden synagogues in northern Lithuania.

Dymshits, who is Jewish, studied chemistry and biology at university before turning his attention to Soviet Jewish heritage and history. "All Jewish studies in Russia are quite young and not professional," he explains. "Somebody has to do this work, so maybe it will be me."

An information sheet has been compiled for each Jewish village or shtetl studied. For information on a particular village or a complete list, send $1 (US) with your inquiry to: Dr. Valery Dymshits, 2512 — 12 Kamennoostrovsky Prospect, St. Petersburg Russia 197061.

The International Seminar on Jewish Genealogy attracted about 160 Americans, several Europeans and some 50 Israelis to the Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza in Jerusalem for five days of talks, field trips and research. The event culminated in a banquet at which Dr. Paul Jacobi, a former vice mayor of Jerusalem, was honored with a special award.

Jacobi has devoted more than 40 years to researching the 420 leading Ashkenazi rabbinic families that held sway over European Jewish life for centuries before World War II. "I wasn't interested in just a list of names — that doesn't carry any meaning for Jewish historians," he said.

"I wanted to solve the enigma of the survival of the Jewish people. No people can survive without an elite to rule it. Without an elite, the collective can't exist. So who and what was this elite that allowed the Jewish people to exist?

"I found out it was a small number of lobbying families that had got hold of almost all kehillot (Jewish communities) and arranged things by shidduchim (arranged marriages) so that most of the posts or vacancies were filled within the rabbinate and the leadership by their people. It was an elite of about 150 families that reigned until 1600."

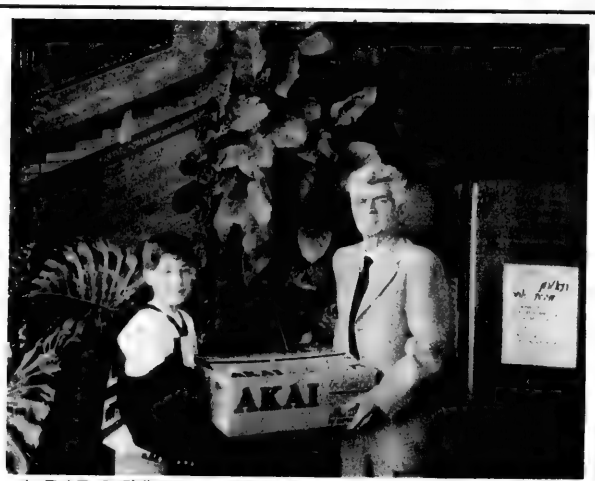
According to Jacobi, who has deposited his research on 95 families with Israel's Beth Hatefutsoth museum, genealogy — family tree research — is not an applied science. "It's an urge, like the sexual urge. It's an urge to find out where you came from. It hasn't got a purpose."

Currently completing work on another 212 family lineages within the European Jewish elite, he hopes to turn his energy to a study of the much-discussed Rashi descent.

Using lists of voters for the Russian Parliament dating from 1906 and 1912, Alexander Beider expects to complete a Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Kingdom of Poland within the coming year. Beider a Russian-born computer programmer living in Paris, astonished the Jewish genealogical community last year with the publication of his Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Russian Empire, which was hailed as the most scholarly and comprehensive work on Jewish surnames ever published.

According to Beider, the adoption of surnames by Jews within the region of Poland followed distinctly different patterns than in all other areas of the former Russian territories. Whereas in the wider region the surnames often derived from a variety of languages including Yiddish, Hebrew, Ukrainian and Russian, within the so-called Kingdom of Poland, the majority of Jewish surnames were based on Polish and German only.

As well, Beider has noted that relatively few Jews in Poland used patronymics, which are surnames derived from a father's first name. Matronic surnames, based on a mother's first name, were almost entirely lacking, he said, citing this as a major difference between Poland and other areas of Russia where Jews lived.



A BAR MITZVAH GIFT FOR DISABLED IDF VETS

Barry Glina of North York recently celebrated his bar mitzvah at the Western Wall in Jerusalem. To mark the occasion, the grade 7 student at St. Andrews Junior High donated a VCR to the Tel Aviv branch of Beit Halochem. Barry's father, Ed Glina, and mother, Debbie Tessler, said their son wanted to share his good fortune with the 4,900 disabled IDF vets who use the physiotherapy, sports and recreation complex. The 'hamish' side of divorce

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shirley Valentine ran off to Greece from the stuffy English midlands, while Constance Beresford-Howe's Eve took her first old age pension cheque and had a fling with a madcap European in a basement apartment.

Here in North York, Rosalynn and Melody, two divorced Jewish women in their 50s, strike out for freedom in their own way and show that life without men is possible, if painful at times.

In How To Live Alone Until You Like It, Corinne Copnick and Gloria Valentine (Rosalynn and Melody) play partially autobiographical roles in their encounters with The Fallen Man, the Married Man and the All- Purpose Man, all played with a comic, subtle deftness by Murray Ellis. The All-Purpose Man is definitely someone every woman would want around the house.

In a brief run to May 29 at the North York Performing Arts Centre, How To Live Alone... proved to be a "hamish"tale of two divorcees who have their share of bad luck. Rosalynn, for instance, has an affair with a real snake-in-the-grass, the married Bartlett Schwartz. "My name is a class statement," the insufferable Schwartz proclaims.

The play owes its charm to the solid singing of Valentine, the magnificent timing of Ellis, and above all the clever lyrics of the 10 songs written by Copnick to music composed by Nathan Samuel Rosen, who, until now, has been a vastly underrated artist. Another surprising element in its success is the ambience of its theatre, cheek-by-jowl with Showboat and the excitement it engenders.

In its next production, How to Live Alone... would benefit from less exposition (the audience is familiar, after all, with the need of women for independence) and more attention to the great songs and their choreography by Shelley Lynne Spiegel, Copnick's daughter.

The innovative set design, with slides and cartoons on a screen as provocative footnotes, was by Don Merrifield with the visuals by Clive Branson. Valentine was creative colloborator and Copnick and her daughter, Janet Spiegel, were co-directors. Greg English was the music director.

The show was produced by La Magie de l'Art Inc., in association with the Jewish Artists Scholarship Society.

Music at Temple Emanu-El: "Have you ever wondered what goes on behind the scenes of a synagogue music program?" writes Amy Gilbert, music director of Toronto's Temple Emanu-El, in a friendly one-page correspondence.

One of the secrets of successful programming is to include new as well as traditional melodies, she asserts. That way, you keep congregants happy while slyly expanding their musical horizons. Gilbert has evidently been enriched through her musical associations with composers Milton Barnes, Srul Irving Glick, Ben Steinberg and Sid Robinovitch.

"Living in 19th century Vienna may have been something like this," she writes. And, oh yes, she wants us to know: Cantor Trubashnik, the Temple Emanu-El Choir, flautist Susan Baskin and clarinetist Sandra Bialystock perform Shirat ha-Nefesh, by Srul Irving Glick, at Temple Emanu-El on June 17.

Toronto Senior Strings: After its well-received debut last fall, this 14-player string ensemble is appeasing public demand by offering a second concert at St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, June 9, 2 p.m. Toronto Senior Strings, conducted by Victor Feldbrill, is the realized dream of Ruth Budd, a 30-year veteran of the Toronto Symphony. Most of the musicians are former members of the TS, Hart House, Canadian Opera Company and National Ballet orchestras. Tickets $10. (416) 488-9452.

Artist unveils Iron Horse sculpture on city's Beltline Railroad Bridge

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — No, it isn't an advertisement for Marlboro cigarettes.

Those dozen horses, seen in silhouette on an old railroad bridge that spans Yonge Street below Davisville Avenue, are the work of 34-year-old site-specific sculptor Robert Sprachman of Toronto.

Entitled The Iron Horse, the sculpture consists of 12 life-sized horse silhouettes arranged on the defunct Beltline Railroad Bridge which also crosses the Davisville subway yard. The official unveiling of the installation was May 5.

Working in the tradition of the American artist Cristo, Sprachman became intrigued with the site, then conceived of the project two years ago. However, the Ontario College of Art graduate could not lasso the necessary dollars from city officials, so he put the idea temporarily to pasture.

Last fall, he was again spurred into action with the realization that he could raise the money himself. After attaining approval from the Public Art Commission of Toronto and Toronto City Council, he quickly corralled several donors who were willing to rustle up $10,000, enough to cover his hard costs and incidental expenses.

A major sponsor is Plastiglas Industries Ltd., which manufactures the fibre-reinforced plastic of which the horses are made. Composed of mostly recycled materials, the substance has 10 times the strength of concrete and can be moulded to simulate almost any material. Other sponsors include David and Vivian Campbell, Nancy Draper, Carol and Morton Rapp, Carol and Mandel Sprachman, and Burle and Louise Yolles.

Why horses? Part of it has to do with train associations — the iron horse — and part with the recognition that most forms of modern transit evolved from the horse.

"I think with something like this, you can start off on a very superficial level. You can say, 'There's a horse on the bridge' — even a 2-year-old can look up and see that," Sprachman said.

"And once you've made that connection you can go a step further and say, 'Okay, why are those horses on the bridge, what does it mean?' I really believe you can take this piece as far as you want. There's the art history aspect, there's our relation with nature, there's time, there's history, there's all of these things. But I don't want to impose an interpretation on anybody, either."

And what if someone supposes it might be an ad-in-progress for Marlboro smokes? "That's great," exudes the bearded artist with a smile. "That's highly indicative of how we think these days."

Sprachman says it was a fortuitous coincidence that the city was planning to reopen the bridge and this section of the beltline when he approached them. Originally laid in 1889, the Beltline Railroad served as a commuter railroad in what was then suburban Toronto. Too costly to operate, the commuter service closed two years later, but the rail line served local industry until 1970.

Made into a park that attracts many joggers and cyclists, the belt line runs from the Allen Road to its present terminus east of Yonge Street. According to Sprachman, the city eventually intends to extend the park beyond Mount Pleasant Cemetery to Moore Avenue.

Sprachman likely learned much about contextual art from his father, the noted architect Mandel Sprachman, who restored Toronto's much-praised Elgin-Winter Garden Theatre. His late grandfather, Abraham Sprachman, was one of the first Jewish architects in Toronto, and designed the landmark Eglinton Theatre and other theatres around Ontario.

"My father and grandfather created architecture related to entertainment — all their movie houses and concert halls — so I think that an element of entertainment is key to what I do."

The Iron Horse is a temporary installation. The horses stay put for six months. After that Sprachman, who has donated his time and energy to the people of Toronto, hopes to sell them individually.

"As an emerging artist, I think it's important to get the exposure and recognition. I don't think artists are in it for the money. If I can make enough money to live, that's fantastic. I'm just delighted that I was able to cover my costs on this project."

Shakespeare classic gets new twist

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The ardent love Romeo and Juliet have for each other is foiled, not because of an ancient grudge between the Montagues and the Capulets, but because Romeo is black and Juliet is white.

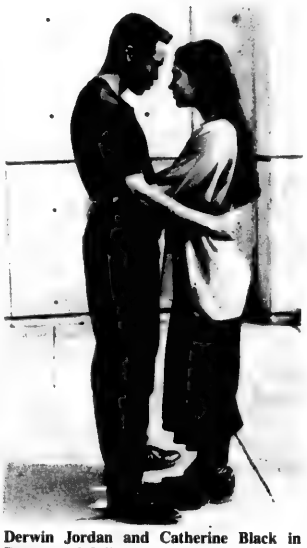
This is the spin given Shakespeare's play by the Young Company of the Leah Posluns Theatre School running May 25-June 4 at the Studio Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

Directed by Lewis Baumander, this version opens with a friendly, inter-racial basketball game as the audience files into their seats. But the game is broken up by a Capulet and a tragic denouement looms.

The Elizabethan music of Shakespeare's day is replaced by contemporary jazz, and instead of frocks and tunics, the young actors wear 1990s street clothes, and sword fights give way to gang fights on the streets.

"But not a word of the text is altered," said Baumander. So Juliet will still make her famous "Romeo, wherefore art thou Romeo?" speech from the balcony. But he has cut about an hour from the full text so it will run just under two hours, without an intermission.

Derwin Jordan, 24, and Catherine Black, 17, who play the leads, hope that this version of Romeo and Juliet will bring its audience closer to an understanding of inter-racial tensions.



Derwin Jordan and Catherine Black in Romeo and Juliet.

This is the hope too of Rose Dubin, director of the Leah Posluns Theatre School, who notes that 18 high schools in Metro are sending students to see Romeo and Juliet. "In our intimate Studio Theatre (140 seats) there will be a special relationship between the young actors and the audience," Dubin said.

"We felt this is an opportune time to try to improve relations between races," she said.

Jordan (Romeo), a native of Montreal, is a graduate in theatre arts at York University. His father, Christopher Jordan, is a principal dancer with the Trinidad-Tobago company. Derwin will appear this summer in Twelfth Night at High Park in Toronto, the annual open air production sponsored by Canadian Stage.

Black (Juliet) is a Grade 12 student at SEED, an alternative high school. Her mother, Pamela Tanner, dancing under the name of Pamela Stutz, was a principal ballerina with the Canadian National Ballet. "She didn't want me to train as a dancer, she wanted me to have a life of my own," Black said.

The evening performances are at 7.30 p.m. and the student matinees at 12 and 1 p.m. Some seats are available for the matinees. The tickets are $7, general admission, and $6 for students and seniors. For information, 630-6752.

The cast of 19 actors and dancers ranges in age from 14 to 25 and is about even in the number of blacks and whites. About half the cast are high school students.

Artists' exhibit features Judaic theme

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — Many of this city's long-time Jewish residents have never seen a challah on Dundas Street, and certainly not in the Forest City Gallery.

"I think it's the first time that's happened here," said one.

The Gallery's two artists-in-residence, Lily Markiewicz and Devora Neumark, recently put on an minimalist exhibit titled, Like (In) The Space Of Breath. One part was a display case filled with white and challah breads.

Markiewicz and Neumark collaborated on this project to share some of their questions and thoughts on the definition of space (eruv), ritual and community.

"I use my Jewish background in art to focus on the process of creating identity," Markiewicz said. A child of Holocaust survivors, she was raised in Germany and currently lives in London, England.

"This is my first work involving Judaism; usually I deal in themes of history, memory and life and death," said Neumark, raised Orthodox in New York City and currently living in Montreal.

The gallery was rigged with taut string, with visitors walking outside the "fence" before having to bend underneath it at the entrance to a second room. "A metaphor for the invisible barriers in our life," suggested Neumark.

Small work station

Flour was another part of the exhibit. A large institutional mixing bowl, donated by Weston Bakeries, was part of a small work station in the second room. The artists took turns sifting flour near the large street windows. As the sifted, they told stories in the tradition of oral histories.

Bread and breath are very similar words, Neumark explained, equating bread with life and community, and breath with the giving of that life.

Their presence was tremendously helpful for those having difficulty understanding minimalist art. Their input and friendly manner encouraged questioning and left no visitor bored.

"Why is flour spread all over the floor," asked a visitor. "Because the flour leaves footprints, just as we leave traces of ourselves everywhere we travel," was the answer. We always carry parts of our traditions with us, Neumark said.

When Markiewicz and Neumark weren't present, the exhibit used photographs and tape recordings of their voices in their place. No doubt the exhibit took on a more passive role, encouraging the viewer to make sense of the string, flour on the floor and a challah in the window of Dundas Street. Markiewicz and Neumark are hoping to find funding to create a traveling exhibit.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Eighth Day, by Samuel Kurinsky (Jason Aronson Inc., no price indicated).

The author of this myth-shattering book is an eminent archaeologist with a persuasive conviction. He maintains that major contributions of Jews to the development of human civilization have been downplayed or neglected.

Drawing upon biblical, archaeological, archival and historical materials, Kurinsky explores and outlines Jewish creative contributions in the ancient Egyptian, Canaanite, Persian, Greek and Roman periods.

Even in biblical times, he says, the Jews were artisans, craftsmen, traders and the inhabitants and builders of cities — not simple nomadic shepherds. "The tribe of Abraham is depicted as wandering into Canaan on camel-back from the wastelands of Arabia only by virtue of the imaginations of scholars who consistently ignore the biblical rendition and by those who blithely follow in their wake." Actually, it was from urban, cosmopolitan Harran, one of the important epicentres of ancient civilization, that Abraham and his entourage emigrated to Canaan.

The author asserts that at the height of Roman rule over the Western world the total population of the Empire was some 45 million, of which some seven million or more were Jews, amounting to 12 per cent of the entire subject population. Another million or so Jews lived in Mesopotamia and central Asia.

These Jews were concentrated at ports and productive urban centres and were the driving force of each region's mercantile and financial activity. Thus, the sheer number of Jews bespeaks the importance of Jewish culture in the life of the Greeks and Romans far beyond that commonly accredited to them. Although little noticed by historians, Jewish slaves built the Colosseum of Rome, mined the iron and copper of Sicily and the gold and silver of Spain.

"Jewish artisans introduced silk agronomy and industry to the West; they were smiths and dyers and weavers and tanners and shoemakers and tailors and loggers and wagoners; they minted coins for European nobility; they were merchants at the local markets." They formed a core of international trade, being able to issue a letter of credit in one country and be assured of its being honored in another country months and even years later.

An expert on the history of ancient glassmaking, the author shows that it was an art in which Jews predominated over a period of three millennia and for which they had been denied credit. Glass making is remarkable in that it was invented only once and the knowledge of the process made its way around the world in ever widening spirals in the hands of those who developed it and passed the secret on to succeeding generations.

Why isn't the Jewish contribution more widely recognized? Apart from religious prejudice and the antagonism of many scholars there are other reasons. Prominent among them is the dearth of distinguishing artifacts. Jews did not glorify their priests and kings with statuary. The inscriptions on the monuments from which much of ancient history are derived is therefore, not available. Nor did the Jews normally shield their homes or bury their dead with idol amulets or figurines. Sparsely furnished Jewish temples, meeting halls and institutions were almost universally levelled, and the treasures they may have housed were plundered. Kurinsky points out that the Jewish progenitors of Canaan were among those referred to as "Asiatics" by the Egyptians; the Jews of Judah were among those referred to as "Syrians" by the Greeks and Romans, and they are classified with the "Palestinians" or "Syro-Palestinians" by contemporary archaeologists. The Jewish component was omitted.

This work, accessible to the general reader, but probably of greatest interest to students, will not find quick acceptance in scholarly circles. Some of its surprising conclusions will be contested. But Kurinsky's research has undeniably brought to light the extent of the hitherto unacknowledged Jewish contribution to many fields of ancient society.

Film documents hidden children

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Julia Sereny, a Toronto filmmaker, has made a thoughtful and poignant documentary about Jewish children hidden during the Holocaust.

Her film Hidden Children will be broadcast on TVOntario June 7 at 10 p.m.

The six survivors she profiles were traumatized by their experiences, in large part because they were cut off from their Jewish heritage.

Marianna Adamachek was nine years old when she was concealed in a barn in Poland. After the war, she was overlooked by officials seeking out Jewish children who had been hidden by Christians.

At 16, she married a Pole, then gave birth to a successsion of children. She went to church regularly, if only for "appearances sake."

Reflecting on her hard, unhappy life in rural Poland, Marianna compares herself to an orphan, and voices regret that she wasn't found and reunited with her family in Israel. Accompanied by her daughter, she travels to Israel to meet her relatives. Only then does she feel happy and content.

Sophie Zaretsky was raised as a Catholic by her mother in Nazi-occupied Poland. Sophie was a "very ardent" Catholic and felt comfortable as a Christian.

When they moved to England in 1948, Sophie's identity as a Jew was revealed. She couldn't cope with it because she had become an anti-Semite! Today, Sophie lives in New York. It's not entirely clear how she regards her Jewishness now.

Andre Stein is a Toronto writer and psychotherapist who was a boy when Germany invaded his native Hungary. But even before the 1944 Nazi invasion, Andre, at his father's insistence, concealed his real identity. Indeed, Andre pretended to be an Austrian aristocrat, a claim he couldn't sustain.

Andre emerged from the war with tormenting memories, and even now, he carries "a bundle of unshakeable pain."

Grzegorz Pawlowski, nee Jacob Hirsh Greiner, ran away from home in Poland shortly before his parents were shot. He masqueraded as a Catholic, and in 1958, he was ordained as a priest.

Miriam Rakowski

Nevertheless, he never forgot his Jewish past. In 1966, he wrote an article about himself. His brother in Israel read it and contacted Grzegorz. The latter emigrated to Israel and lives there today.

Grzegorz remains a priest, though he loves religious Jews. On a visit to a synagogue in the United States, he had to be careful not to kneel or cross himself. He feels guilty about having deserted his parents. He wants to be buried in a Jewish cemetery.

Miriam Rakowski was two months old when she was taken in by a Christian family in Belgium. At the age of four, she was suddenly reunited with her mother. For Miriam, it was a traumatic experience, since she was so attached to her foster parents.

Miriam, now a resident of New York City, still bears emotional scars. She feels "unresolved," seems unable to commit to relationships, and describes the first four years of her life as "the happiest and most secure."

Frieda Stieglitz was deeply affected by her life as a runaway in wartorn Poland. "The sadness I have inside never goes away," she says.

No one claimed her immediately after the war, and she was thrown into limbo. She did not learn the meaning of love and affection, and when she was reunited with her father, she was incapable of hugging him.

The stories related in Hidden Children are both fascinating and sad. Sereny has distilled the essence of her subjects' sorrow, grief and guilt.

Romantic comedy harkens to a much simpler time

TORONTO — In 1937 Bucharest, apparently it wasn't unusual for a rich man to declare his true love for a shopgirl and to defend her honor against his enemies.

This is the story of A Winter Night's Dream, a romantic comedy by Romanian playwright Tudor Musatescu that harks back to simpler times and happy endings. A Winter Night's Dream is presented by Chaim Avron's Spotlight Productions at Fairview Library Theatre May 24 to 29.

But there are problems. Craig Tallman as the wealthy author and Hillary Goldhar as the jewellery store shopgirl fail to elicit much chemistry between them and are on stage too long before the plot takes shape.

Marlene Charney plays the vindictive and spoiled mistress. She tells her rich author-lover as they are splitting up: "Do you know what it means for a woman to have to read 40 books in three years?"

Stepping in at the last moment to take over the role of Goldhar's father, Chaim Avron turns in the most polished performance as a man who realizes a rich son-in-law can overcome his own philosophical opposition to marriage.

There are good comedic performances from Erol Arbel as the valet, Jonathan Spivak as Goldhar's rejected suitor and Morris Jacobs as the drunken villain. — B.R.

Jewish Folk Choir still going strong

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are few cultural groups in Toronto that have displayed the resiliency of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, now in its 68th season.

Its sturdiness was well displayed at the recent annual spring concert at Rosedale Heights Secondary School.

Under conductor Esther Ghan Firestone, the choir and guest artists and soloists presented an eclectic afternoon of Yiddish and Hebrew songs, including a Yiddish folk operetta, A Bunt Mit a Statchke (A Revolt and a Strike).

A highlight was the performance of To Dispel the Darkness by Ben Steinberg, with the composer conducting.

The lilting, Sephardi melodies played by flute player Suzanne Shulman were written to mark the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492. Its sunny, uplifting four-part score is a real harbinger of spring. The intricate piano accompaniment was beautifully executed by Lina Zemelman.

Harking back to czarist Russia of 1905, A Bunt Mit a Statchke is a reminder of the radicalism of the Jewish working class in attempting to throw off the yoke of long hours and low pay, as David Abramowitz' lead-in related. Its defiance and spirit leaps forward in these lyrics: "The boss's wife is coming, so sew more quickly...She's on the doorstep...may she rot!...She's coming in...quiet! Now she's going, so have a good laugh!"

Later in the operetta, one boss says to another: "Give them a raise and an eight-hour day, and they won't make any statchkes. The soloists were Elizabeth Block, Eugene Burke, Bruce K. Hill and Denise Williams.

Young Israeli clarinetist Sigal Hechtliner illuminated Yiddish songs arranged by Srul Irving Glick and performed by the Ensemble Singers: A glezele l' chairm (A glass of cheer); Moyshele main fraint (my friend Moyshele); and Shpilt a freilichs (Play a Happy Dance).

The choir's voices seemed to soar out of the building in performing John Weinzweigh's Am Yisroel Chai (The Jewish People Lives). It was commissioned for a Jewish Music Festival in Toronto in 1953, and sets the Yiddish text of American-Jewish poet Malka Lee to music. The song is dedicated to Holocaust survivors who founded 12 kibbutzim in the Negev after World War II.

The four numbers in Songs from Four Continents exemplified the solid, multi-racial ethos of this choir, including the Yiddish folk song Yankele; El Canto del Caminante (The Wanderer's Song) an Indian piece from the Yucatan; Ma Yafim (Palestine Nights); and Walk Together Children, a black spiritual. Giselle Kulak's fine voice embroidered Yankele with heart-felt emotion while Williams' pure and tremulous outpouring did the same for Ma Yafim.

The rousing A Zemerl (A Song of the Rich and the Poor) with Burke and Kulak as soloists closed out the program. As always, there were literate and insightful program notes by Ben-Z. Shek.
